405 *A wife's right of dower is an emanation from the ownership of her husband, and subject to all its qualifications; though not to his alienations or incumbrances during the coverture, without her consent declared in the mode prescribed by law. Her right is dependant upon his, as existing at the inception of the coverture, or as acquired by him during its continuance. If he mortgage his land before marriage, her claim to dower is subordinate to the mortgage, and, if that be foreclosed, is completely divested. So if she unite, with the requisite solemnity, in his mortgage made after the marriage, the effect of a foreclosure is the same. If, during the coverture, he purchase mortgaged land, her title, like his, is subject to the incumbrance, and the foreclosure of it destroys both. The result is the same where an incumbrance is created by the very act of purchasing; for if the purchase money be unpaid and not secured, an equitable mortgage is embodied in the transaction itself, and if that be foreclosed by a sale of the property under the decree of a court of equity, the wife's right of dower is completely extinguished.

In the present state of our law, the right to dower springs from the substantial, not the formal ownership of the husband. At common law, it is true, the legal title only was regarded; and a mere legal seisin, without any beneficial ownership, enabled the wife to recover dower. Thus the wife of a trustee who had the legal estate in fee, and the wife of a mortgagee after condition broken, had a valid title to dower. But the courts of equity corrected this injustice, and in such cases restrained the widow and punished her with costs, if she attempted to recover by legal proceedings. Another consequence of the disregard by the courts of common law of any but legal rights, was, to refuse dower to the widow in trusts and other equitable estates, and consequently in the equity of redemption of a mortgage in fee. This narrowness, 406 instead of being *redressed, was followed by the courts of equity, and still prevails in the english jurisprudence. But in Virginia, New York, and other states of this union, it is corrected by legislative enactments. Our act of 1785 gives dower in equitable, in like manner as in legal estates: and in this, as in other respects, the rules and incidents of legal estates are now applied to trust and mortgaged property. The equity of redemption of a mortgage in fee descends to the heirs of the mortgagor; and though the widow is not entitled to dower as against the mortgagee, where the mortgage was executed before the coverture, or during the coverture with her concurrence in the mode prescribed by law; yet in either case she is entitled to dower in the equity of redemption; for of that, or, what is the same thing, of the estate subject to the mortgage, the husband is to be considered as having died seized. Heth v. Cocke & wife, 1 Rand. 344; Swaine v. Perine, 5 Johns. Ch. R. 492; Hale v. James, 6 Johns. Ch. R. 258. This is equally true of the vendee's right of redemption in regard to the vendor's lien. His wife is dowable of that, but of nothing more; or, what is in effect the same, she is dowable of the estate purchased, subject to the equitable incumbrance for the purchase money.

A widow's right of dower, however, in an equity of redemption, or in other words in the land subject to the incumbrance, legal or equitable, is merely conditional, and dependant upon the fact of redemption. If the heir redeems, she is dowable on contributing ratably; or she may herself redeem, to the extent of her dower, by like contribution. But if she submits to a foreclosure, her right is extinguished. 4 Kent's Comm. 39, 44, 45, 46; Coates v. Cheever, 1 Cowen 479; Heth v. Cocke & wife, 1 Rand. 344. And the validity of a foreclosure is in no wise affected by the circumstance that the land is of greater value than the amount of the incumbrance; or, where the 407 foreclosure is by a sale of *the property, that there is a surplus of the proceeds. Heth v. Cocke & wife.

Thus it will be seen that there is no longer any magic in the word seisin, by which the shadow may be made the substance, or the substance the shadow. A legal title in the husband is nothing as regards the wife's right of dower, unless accompanied by the beneficial ownership; and the beneficial ownership is every thing, though separated from the legal title.

But there can be no beneficial ownership in opposition to a paramount incumbrance, though there may be in subordination to it. The possession of a mortgagor, his perception of the profits, his improvements, give him no beneficial ownership as against the mortgagee. Upon the foreclosure of the mortgage, his possession, and enjoyment, and improvements are all swept away; and with them his wife's right of dower, if that be also subject to the mortgage. The practice of the english chancery is simply to foreclosure the equity of redemption, the effect of which is to vest the complete ownership of the property in the mortgagee. In Virginia the practice is to direct a sale of the property, and the effect is to confer the title upon the purchaser under the decree, and place the proceeds at the disposal of the court. The enforcement of the vendor's lien, by a decree for the sale of the property, is in like manner a foreclosure. In all, there is equally a foreclosure of the equity or right of redemption; and the only difference is, that in the first the title is established in the mortgagee, while in the others it is transferred to the purchaser.

No distinction can be successfully drawn between a legal and equitable incumbrance, as to the effect, upon the wife's right of dower. In either case the question always is, whether the incumbrance be paramount or subordinate to the dower right. If during the coverture the husband pur-408 chase land, receive a conveyance, *and at the same time give a mortgage thereon to secure the purchase money, the wife's right of dower is subject to the mortgage. There the ownership of the husband is qualified by the nature of the transaction. The two instruments are justly considered as parts of the same contract, and the result is the same as if the provisions of both were embraced in the same deed. So if the executory contract of sale were to stipulate that the property should be liable for the payment of the purchase money, the vendor would have a lien therefor, even though a conveyance of the legal title were subsequently made to the vendee. And this is substantially the nature of the transaction, where the executory contract is silent upon the subject of a lien: equity supplies the omission, and presumes the parties to have so intended. This presumption, however, arises only where the parties omit to provide expressly for any security. If other security be stipulated, the idea of a lien is thereby repelled. So, too, the implied lien is rejected by the vendor's taking a mortgage upon the property at a period subsequent to the deed of conveyance. There the vendee becomes the owner, without qualification at the time of the purchase, and the inceptive dower right of the wife thereupon attaches; nor can it be divested by the subsequent incumbrance, without her concurrence therein in the manner provided by law. The equitable lien may, moreover, be lost by reason of a supervening equity in favour of a purchaser from the vendee; as where he obtains a conveyance, and pays the consideration, without notice of the nonpayment of the original purchase money. In that case the widow of the first vendee would be entitled to dower; the incumbrance being extinguished, and her legal right unaffected by any want of notice of it on the part of the subvendee.

That, in the case before us, the wife's right of dower was subject to the 409 vendor's lien, there can be no room *to doubt; and the decree of the circuit court in her behalf is founded upon that idea, for otherwise it would have been for dower in the land, instead of the surplus proceeds of the sale. The questions therefore which we have to decide are, first, whether the wife was entitled to a share of the surplus proceeds; and secondly, whether the purchaser under the decree in the suit brought by the vendor, and the property in his hands, be liable therefor.

The effect of the sale at the vendor's suit was to convert the subject from realty into personalty. This is as precisely true in regard to the surplus, as it is in regard to the amount applied to the discharge of the vendor's claim. Still the wife would have been entitled in equity to a due proportion of the surplus, if her right to dower subject to the incumbrance had been consummated. But this was far from being the case. Her husband was living at the time of the sale, and of the final decree by which it was confirmed; and the proceedings were, with strict propriety, against him alone as the only defendant in that cause. She had then no title whatever. Her right to dower subject to the incumbrance was merely inchoate and contingent, and could never be established but by her survivorship of her husband. The property sold was his, and its conversion from realty into personalty was not his act, but by operation of the paramount incumbrance. In its new form it was still his, after satisfying the incumbrance; but its character being changed, it was no longer subject to a future dower title as realty, but only to that provision which the law makes for a widow out of the personal estate of her husband, subsisting at his death, after payment of his just debts. If the husband had been dead and she surviving at the time of the sale, then her dower right subject to the incumbrance would have been ripened into a perfect title, and her interest in the surplus could not have been divested by 410 the discretion *which the court had exercised, of selling the whole land, instead of such part only as might have been sufficient to discharge the incumbrance. In the language of chancellor Kent, in Titus v. Neilson, 5 Johns. Ch. R. 457. "If the right of dower be consummated by the husband's death before the sale, (for it is clear that she would have had no claim upon the proceeds after the satisfaction of the first mortgage, if the husband had been living) she has a good right in equity to have her dower satisfied out of the surplus proceeds, which represent the equity of redemption."

Thus I think it clear that the wife had no interest in the surplus of the proceeds of sale, and that it was properly applied, with the consent of the husband, to the satisfaction of his creditors. It is supposed by the counsel for the appellee that this doctrine would lead to abuse, and to the introduction of a new mode of barring the wife's right of dower. The argument against a just principle, however, founded upon alleged inconvenience in its operation, is always suspicious; and the inconvenience will generally be found the other way. If a case should occur of a combination, eluding the vigilance of the court, between a vendor or mortgagee and the husband, to expose the whole subject unnecessarily to sale, in order to defeat the contingent dower right of the wife, it will then be time enough to decide, upon a bill with proper averments, what is to be the effect upon that right of such a contrivance. A conspiracy of that kind is rather improbable, when we consider the facility with which husbands usually obtain relinquishments of dower rights from their wives. But in the present case nothing, of the sort is pretended; nor is any complaint made of the manner in which the judicial power of the court was exercised; and it must therefore be taken, if that were material, to have been properly and discreetly exercised, with a due regard to the rights and interests of all concerned in the subject.

411 *In fact, the bill is not framed with a view to the recovery of a supposed interest in the surplus proceeds, but for the recovery of dower in the land itself, upon the utterly erroneous pretension that it was paramount to the vendor's lien, or, if not so, that the appellee had still a right to redeem upon contributing a due proportion of the incumbrance, notwithstanding its foreclosure by the sale and conveyance to the purchaser under the decree.

On the other hand, upon the supposition of an inchoate and contingent interest of the wife in the surplus proceeds, requiring the protection of the court, by what means was such protection to be afforded? I can conceive of none other than a sequestration of the surplus, or a sufficient portion thereof, during the coverture, to await the title of the wife, if a title on her part should ever accrue. The coverture might continue for half a century. In the mean time the fund would be locked up, to the prejudice of the husband's interest, and of the wife's too, as connected with his. And when the coverture is determined, if by the death of the wife, the precaution will have been merely mischievous, and if by the death of the husband, the value of the wife's interest, to be ascertained in reference to that period, may not exceed a single dollar. It seems to me an anomalous idea to set apart and withhold from the husband a portion of his estate, for the dower of the wife, if she should ever become entitled to it. Such an equity on the part of a feme covert would require her to be heard as a party in every suit against her husband for the foreclosure of a mortgage, legal or equitable. No one supposes that this would be proper; and the reason simply is, that she has nothing to be protected till the death of her husband.

But if all this were wrong, how is the purchaser under the decree of foreclosure, or the property in his hands, to be affected by the failure of the court to do 412 *its duty in that regard? He accepted the invitation of the court to become the purchaser, received by its order a complete title, and paid up according to its directions the full amount of the consideration. What more concern had he in the matter? Was it his duty to resist the mandate of the court? could he have resisted it? That was impossible. He was bound hand and foot by the authority of the court, and could not move a finger in opposition to its decree. And yet we are now called upon to subject him to loss because of his obedience. Can a court of conscience do this? Would it not be gross injustice, nay more, would it not be rank oppression? Establish such a doctrine, and there will never again be a surplus at such a judicial sale.

It surely cannot be true that a purchaser under such circumstances is responsible for an error of the court in the disposition of the proceeds; or that he is bound to see to the proper application of the purchase money. The court itself made what it held to the proper application, and the purchaser had nothing more to do with it. There are some cases, sufficiently harsh, in which a purchaser has been compelled to see to the proper application of purchase money by the hands of other individuals; but none, I believe, where the application has been made by the hands of the court. If the court has jurisdiction of the subject, and the proper parties are before it, a purchaser under its decree is not affected by irregularities or errors in the proceedings, provided the sale be made according to the decree. Nor is he bound to see that only so much of the estate is sold as is necessary for the purposes of the trust; nor to see to the application of the purchase money, when the court takes upon itself the application. 2 Smith's Ch. Pract. 196; Bennett v. Hamill, 2 Sch. & Lef. 566; 1 Sugden on Vendors, 9th edi. p. 58; 2 Id. p. 34.

But let us suppose that the appellee had a valid claim against the purchaser 413 under the decree, and the *property in his hands; it is at best an equitable, not a legal claim; and if there be others against whom there is a stronger equity, they ought to be resorted to primarily, and the purchaser and the property only eventually. Now surely the creditors of the husband, who in this aspect of the case have improperly obtained the very fund in question, in satisfaction of their claims, ought to be subjected in relief of the innocent purchaser; and there can be no propriety in making him primarily responsible for what has been appropriated by them, without his default, to their benefit. If therefore the appellee's pretensions had been well founded, instead of being, as I conceive, utterly baseless, those creditors ought to have been brought before the court, and a decree rendered against them in the first instance, and only eventually against the purchaser and the property in his hands, or in the hands of those deriving title from him.

It is proper to add, that I think the decree also erroneous in the mode and measure of relief granted to the appellee; and on that point I concur entirely in the opinion of judge Allen, and in the valuable suggestions of the enlightened judge who has favoured us with remarks and illustrations upon the proper mode of calculating the present value of life annuities.

Upon the whole case, my opinion is that the decree of the circuit court ought to be reversed, and the plaintiff's bill dismissed with costs.

STANARD, J., said, that if he had been of opinion, with judge Allen, that the widow had a valid claim against the purchasers, he should have concurred in the results of that opinion, both in respect to the right of election, and the principle on which the value of the dower interest was to be ascertained. But he was of opinion, with judge Baldwin, that the claim against the purchasers could not be sustained.

414 And therefore the *decree of this court was, that the decree of the circuit court should be reversed, and the bill dismissed with costs.

Note by reporter.—In the case of Heyward v. Cuthbert, 1 M'Cord 386, the widow had recovered a sum in gross, in full of her dower. This case is referred to by Nott, J., delivering the opinion of the court in Wright v. Jennings, 1 Bailey 280, in the following terms: "It appeared that the commissioners had assessed one sixth of the fee simple value of the estate, which assessment was sustained; and the same rule has generally prevailed since that period, and I believe has been approved by experience. We have no table of life annuities in this state, and if we had, the commissioners usually appointed for the performance of this duty would be very incompetent to apply it to the various cases that might arise. I think, therefore, that we had better adhere to the rule adopted in the case of mra. Heyward, except in extreme cases, of youth on the one hand, or of age and infirmity on the other; in which something more or less, according to circumstances, may be allowed." These are the views of the court of appeals of South Carolina. On the other hand the supreme court of Massachusetts, as a guide in estimating the probable duration of the life by which a dower interest is limited, adopted, upon its publication, the table made by professor Wigglesworth of Cambridge university, published in the Transactions of the american academy, vol. 2, p. 133. Estabrook v. Hapgood, 10 Mass. Rep. 315. That table may be seen also in the American Jurist for April 1834, vol. 11, p. 492, as well as in 2 Rob. Pract. 381. It may be inferred from the opinions in Wilson &c. v. Davisson, that in estimating the probable duration of life in Virginia, this table, in the absence of any other better adapted to our state, may be generally used as a guide; liable of course to be departed from, where the particular circumstances of any case shall make it proper to do so. After fixing upon the probable duration of life, it is to be then ascertained, by a proper mode of calculation, what any given sum, payable annually for the estimated term, is worth at present. In Rees's Cyclopaedia, vol. 2, title Annuities, much information is furnished on the subject. The following is extracted from that article.

"Annuities may be considered as payable yearly, halfyearly, or quarterly. The present value of an annuity is that sum which, being improved at compound interest, will be sufficient to pay the annuity.

"The present value of an annuity certain, payable yearly, and the first payment of which is to 415 be made at the end of a year, is *calculated in the following manner. Let the annuity be supposed to be £100: the present value of the first payment of it, or of an hundred pounds to be received a year hence, is that sum in hand, which, being put out to interest, will increase to £100 in a year. In like manner the present value of the second payment, or of £100 to be received two years hence, is that sum in hand, which, being put out to interest, will increase to £100 in two years. The like is true of the value of the 3d, 4th, 5th &c. payments; and the sum of the values of all the payments is the value of the annuity.

"Let the interest be supposed to be 4 per cent. The sum which, improved at 4 per cent. interest for a year, will produce £100 at the end of the year, is the sum which bears the same proportion to £100 that £100 bears to £100 with 4 added to it, that is, to £104. Say, then, as £104 is to £100, so is £100 to a fourth proportional, which will be 96, 15, or £96. 3s. the value of the first payment.

"Again, the sum which, improved at 4 per cent. for two years, will produce £100 at the end of two years, is the sum which, being now put out to interest, will produce in a year that sum which in one year more will produce £100; that is, it is the sum that will produce in a year £96. 3s.; for it has been just shewn that £96. 3s. will in a year produce £100. Say, then, as 104 is to £100, so is £96. 3s., or 96, 15, to a fourth proportional, which will be 92, 45, or £92. 9s. The value therefore of the second payment is £92. 9s.

"By proceeding in this method, it will be found that the values of the 3d, 4th, 5th &c. payments are £88. 80, £85. 48, £82. 19, &c. The sum of 10, 20, or 100 of these values, is £811, £1350, £2450, respectively, or the present value of an annuity of £100 payable for 10, 20, or 100 years. The sum of an infinite number of these values is £2500, of the value of a perpetual annuity of £100 at 4 per cent."

In the communication referred to in Judge Allen's opinion, Judge Smith remarks that the results produced by taking Wigglesworth's table as a guide in respect to the duration of life, and calculating the discount by simple interest, have been so glaringly incorrect, that the table has been often thrown aside under an idea that the error must be in that, whereas the error (he says) is in the mode of calculation. Judge Smith does not question the correctness of the table as a guide in cases generally; but, taking the expectation of life as correct, he considers the true rule to be to calculate the discount by compound interest. He refers to Pike's Arithmetic, 2d edition enlarged, p. 268, where it is said, "The purchasing annuities by simple interest is unjust and absurd, which may be easily made to appear by one instance only: the price of an annuity of £100 to continue 30 years, discounting at 416 six per cent., will *amount to nearly £2000, the interest of which for one year only, exceeds the annuity; would it not therefore be highly absurd to give a sum which would yield me nearly £120 yearly forever, for an annuity of £100 to continue only 30 years?" He refers also to the american edition of Nicholson's British Encyclopedia, title Annuities, where it is said, "The present value of an annuity is that sum which, improved at compound interest, will be sufficient to pay the annuity;" and then proceeds as follows: "This is the correct rule according to Pike, who, to facilitate calculations, has made out a table (p. 325), shewing the present worth of an annuity of £1 for any number of years from 1 to 40, calculating by compound interest. I have found it very accurate, and will send you herewith an extract of so much of it as gives the present value at 6 per cent., only changing the £1 into $1, as being more convenient. You will find it marked A. I may also remark that I have seen in Jessee's Arithmetic a table corresponding precisely with this, and the author gives it as the true rule.

"I have endeavoured to test the correctness of these tables, and the principle upon which they are constructed; and I think I can give my views best by supposing a case, and sending you the calculations I have made, for your inspection. Let us suppose then that a widow, having her life estate in dower land worth annually $60, agrees with the reversioner that they will sell out and out, and divide the money by the correct rule; that the land sells for $1000, and it is estimated and agreed that her expectation of life shall be put down at ten years: then, by a fair division of this money, the owner of the life estate ought to have what would be equivalent to $60 per annum for 10 years, and the reversioner ought to have what would be, in cash, a just equivalent for $1000 ten years hence. I have made a calculation of the value of the life estate, or rather the annuity for 10 years, discounting by simple interest; and it appears to be $458.93 3-10 cents. I send it that you may compare it with the others. It is marked B." [The principle of calculating by compound interest being that approved by the judges of the court of appeals, it is thought unnecessary to publish the table B.]

"I have also made a calculation, taking the discount of compound interest, which I contend is the true rule; and by this the life estate would be of the present value of $441.60. You will find this calculation marked C.

"If, in dividing the $1000, the owner of the life estate gets $441.60, there will be left for the reversioner $558.40. Let this sum be improved at compound interest for 10 years, to ascertain whether the reversioner will then have his proper sum of $1000. It comes out precisely. I send this calculation marked D.

417 "Let me try this rule by another test. Suppose the owner of the life estate puts out her $441.60, taking bond for it, and stipulating that the borrower shall annually pay $60, to be credited on the bond: let us calculate when the bond would be discharged by such payments. It will be seen by the calculation I send, marked E, that the bond would be discharged precisely at the end of 10 years, and that the owner of the life estate will have received her $60 annually for the 10 years. Does it not follow that $441.60 is the true value of the life estate?

"But let us suppose for a moment that the expectation of life in the case I have been discussing were put down at 30 years, instead of 10 years; then it would be seen by calculation, if made according to the rule of simple interest, that of the $1000, the amount of the sale, there would be nothing to give to the owner of the reversion as his share. In fact, there would not be quite enough to make up the share of the owner of the life estate. The rule of simple interest must therefore, I humbly conceive, be abandoned."

Guardian and Ward—Action for Necessaries—Witness.†

—In an action brought by keepers of a boarding

*He was prevented by indisposition from attending at this term, to wit, from the 15th of October to the 10th of December.

†See monographic note on "Guardian and Ward" appended to Barnum v. Frost, 17 Gratt. 398. The principal case is cited in Gayle v. Hayes, 79 Va. 549.

school against a guardian, for board, tuition, and other necessities furnished to the ward, the administrator of a previous guardian is a competent witness for the plaintiffs. But if it appear that the board, tuition, and other necessities were furnished at the request of the previous guardian, and no express promise has been made by the second guardian to pay therefor, the action against the second guardian for the same cannot be maintained.

This was an action of assumpsit, brought in the circuit court of Mecklenburg by Joseph Warne and George L. Baker. They were teachers in a female academy at Boydton in Mecklenburg county, and rendered services as teachers to Eliza Redd, an orphan, and furnished her with board, books and stationery. Miss Redd was sent to them by her mother and guardian Elizabeth Redd, and was at the academy three sessions, to wit, two in 1826 and one in 1827, the last commencing the 1st monday in January and ending the 20th of June. In March 1827, Elizabeth Redd died. Upon her death, Christopher Haskins qualified as her administrator, and thereafter Samuel Young became guardian of Eliza. This action was brought against Young, by the name of guardian of Eliza Redd, to obtain compensation for the services rendered, and the board, books and stationery furnished, as before mentioned. The declaration, besides counts in indebitatus assumpsit for those services and supplies, contained the money counts, including a count for money had and received by the defendant, as guardian, to the use of the plaintiffs. The plea was the general issue.

*At the trial (which was in April 1830, before judge Saunders) the plaintiffs introduced Christopher Haskins, the administrator before mentioned, as a witness. He was objected to by the defendant, but the court overruled the objection. Haskins proved the facts already mentioned, and also the following, to wit: that Elizabeth Redd received, a year or two before her death, 213 dollars for her ward's proportion of a certain estate; that he (Haskins), as administrator of Elizabeth Redd, had paid the defendant as guardian 200 dollars in money, and delivered him five negroes; and that the ward, after this suit was brought, and while yet an infant, had married. The defendant also gave in evidence a copy of the will of miss Redd's father, whereby he directed that his wife should have the use of all the property bequeathed by him to his said daughter (until she attained the age of 21 years or married) for the purpose of supporting and educating her. And thereupon the defendant, by his counsel, moved the court to instruct the jury, that in the absence of all proof of any express contract between him and the plaintiffs, the action could not be maintained against him; but the court overruled the motion. The defendant excepted to both opinions of the court, as well the opinion admitting Haskins as a witness, as that refusing the instruction.

Verdict being rendered for the plaintiffs for 253 dollars damages, with interest from the 12th of June 1827 till paid, the court gave judgment accordingly for the said damages and interest, and the costs of suit.

On the petition of the defendant, a super-seedeas was awarded.

Taylor for plaintiff in error. Whether the administrator of Mrs. Redd was a competent witness or not, the judgment of the circuit court cannot be sustained. For the second guardian made no contract what-

422 ever with the plaintiffs. Mrs. Redd the mother and first guardian *contracted with them, and there is no principle on which her contract can be shifted from her or her representative to the second guardian. Perhaps the guardian was supposed to be liable on the ground that the board and tuition may be considered as necessities for the ward. But there are at least two sufficient objections to any such ground. 1. A contract of the second guardian to pay for those necessities, which were the subject of express contract by the former guardian, cannot be implied. And 2. where necessities are furnished to a ward at his own instance and request, he is the proper party to be sued. An infant is as competent to contract and bind himself for necessities, as an adult; and when he does so contract, the suit cannot be maintained against the guardian, under the idea of an implied contract by him, unless it can be shewn that he gave authority to his ward to make that particular contract, or that he subsequently ratified and adopted it as his own. Perhaps the guardian was supposed to be liable on the ground that he had received 200 dollars and five slaves belonging to the ward. But this would be in effect to take from the guardian, and apply to the satisfaction of the plaintiffs below, a considerable part of the principal of the ward's estate, though the guardian is not authorized to use the principal for his ward's support. Besides, the contract in this case, made by the first guardian, may have been an improvident one. In justice, the estate of the first guardian ought to be held solely responsible; for she received the whole fund appropriated by the will to the maintenance and education of the ward.

There was no counsel for the defendants in error.

STANARD, J. The evidence on which the instruction was moved utterly fails to shew any contract of the defendant, express or implied, prior or subsequent to the rendition of the services and the furnish-423 ing the supplies *to the ward, on which the claim of the plaintiffs is founded. On the contrary, it shews that if there was any contract for those services and supplies, it was made by the former guardian, and that the services and supplies were rendered and furnished before the defendant became guardian. Unless the law devolved the responsibility arising from the contract of a prior, on a subsequent guardian, the action, so far as it counts on a contract express or implied for those services and supplies, cannot be supported. That the law does not devolve such responsibility on the successor guardian, is, I think, free from all doubt. The action therefore, upon the evidence that was offered, could not be sustained on any of the counts of the declaration alleging an assumpsit of the defendant for those services and supplies. Had there been proof that the fund properly applicable to the support and education of the ward during the time that such support and education were supplied by the plaintiffs, had been uncollected by the former guardian, and had come to the hands of the defendant, or had been paid over by the administrator of the former guardian to the defendant, it might be urged that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover on the count for money had and received by the defendant to their use. Whether, if there had been such proof, it would in law have justified a recovery on that count, I give no opinion, nor have I formed one. There was no such proof, and the question does not arise. On the case made by the evidence, I entirely concur in the opinion of the other judges, that the court below erred in refusing to give the instruction moved by the defendant, and that the judgment must be reversed.

The judgment of the court of appeals was drawn by Baldwin, J., in the following terms:

The court is of opinion that Christopher Haskins was a competent witness on the trial before the jury, in the 424 *proceedings mentioned, and that the circuit court properly refused to exclude his testimony. But the court is further of opinion, that it appearing, from the bill of exceptions, to have been proved on said trial that the board, tuition, and other necessities furnished by the defendants in error to the ward Eliza Redd, were so furnished, not at the request of the plaintiff in error, her last guardian, but at the request of Elizabeth Redd, her former guardian, and that there was no evidence tending to prove an express promise on the part of the plaintiff in error to pay the defendants in error therefor, the said circuit court erred in refusing to instruct the jury, on the motion of the plaintiff in error, that the action against him by the defendants in error for said board, tuition and other necessities could not be maintained. The judgment is therefore reversed with costs, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Nuncupative Will—Last Sickness—Commitment of Testimony to Writing—Construction of Statute *

*Nuncupative Will—Validity—Intention.—It is essen-

What sickness will be considered the last sickness of the deceased, and what will be considered a commitment to writing of the testimony or the substance thereof, within the meaning of the statute concerning nuncupative wills, in 1 R. C. 1819, p. 377, § 7, 8.

Same—Impeachment after Probat—Construction of Statute.—The statute in 1 R. C. 1819, p. 378, § 18, which allows a person interested to appear within seven years after probat of a will, and by bill in chancery to contest the validity of the will, applies only to written and not to nuncupative wills.

Same—Same—Case at Bar.—When a nuncupative will has been proved before a court of competent jurisdiction, after fourteen days from the death of the testator, and after the widow has 425 been summoned to contest the *same, as directed by the act in 1 R. C. 1819, p. 379, § 18, the sentence of the court admitting the same to probat is binding upon her, and cannot be impeached except by appeal therefrom, or by a bill in equity founded upon her having been prevented by fraud or accident from making her defence in the court of probat.

Same—Invalidity as to Realty—Case at Bar.—A nuncupative will is of no effect in law in relation to the testator's real estate, or the profits to accrue therefrom. But where, in the lifetime of the testator, a division was made between him and his two brothers of their father's real estate, which was acted upon by him in his lifetime by taking possession of the part allotted to him, and was also confirmed and ratified by him at the time of making his nuncupative will, the validity of such division was recognized in a court of equity.

Same—Construction of—Case at Bar.—A testator, by a nuncupative will, gave to his wife certain slaves and articles of personalty, "exclusive of the portions of his estate she would be entitled to as his widow under the law." His wife being pregnant, he said he wished his estate to be kept together and managed by his brothers for the benefit of his wife and child during her widowhood, and in tial to the validity of a nuncupative will, that it should appear, that the deceased, at the time he spoke the alleged testamentary words, had a present intention to make his will, and spoke the words with such intention, and should distinctly indicate that intention, by calling upon persons present to take notice or bear testimony that such is his will, or by saying or doing something tantamount in substance, indicating plainly that the words spoken were designed to be testamentary. Winn v. Bob, 3 Leigh 140, 23 Am. Dec. 258. See Phoebe v. Bog-gess, 1 Gratt. 129, and note.

See Va. Code 1887, § 2516; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 77, § 5, p. 706.

Same—Sufficiency of Testamentary Words.—Proof by one witness, that, on a certain day, in the time of the last sickness of the deceased, and at his habitation, he said it was his wish that a certain person should heir all his property; and, by a second witness, that on another day, during the same sickness, and at the same place, he heard the deceased speak the same words, and was told by him to take notice of what he said, is not sufficient to establish a nuncupative will, if the value of the personal property of the deceased exceed thirty dollars. Weeden v. Bartlett, 6 Munf. 123.

Same—Where Made—Habitation.—When a nuncupative will was not made at the habitation of the

the event of her marriage he wished them to manage the child's part of the estate. If the child should live, and then die under age without lawful issues, he wished his brothers to have the whole of his estate in equal portions, except the slaves and articles specifically given to his wife. The child died in ten days after his birth, leaving the testator's brothers, who were the next of kin of the testator and of the child. HELD, that by the true construction of the will, the testator intended that his wife should have in absolute ownership the slaves and other personal property specifically bequeathed to her, together with her legal rights in his estate as his widow, and nothing more: that the child inherited the real estate, subject to the widow's right of dower therein, and was entitled under the will (after payment of debts) to the slaves not specifically bequeathed, subject to the widow's life estate in one-third thereof, and to distribution with the widow, in conformity to law, of the other personal estate not specifically bequeathed: and that, upon the death of the child, his interest in the real estate descended to his paternal uncles, and his interest in the slaves and other personal property passed to them under the executory bequest in their favour contained in the will.

Mann Page died seized of land in Hanover, and after his death a tract of land in King William, called Marshalls, was purchased and paid for out of money 426 which *came to the hands of his executor. He left three children, Robert Page, Charles C. Page and John F. Page, who were entitled to have these lands divided between them. In the latter part of 1828, these children (all of whom were then above 21 years of age) requested three gentlemen to make the division, suggesting that the Hanover land should be divided into two parts, and the King William land make the third part. A plat of the Han-deceased, nor where he had resided for ten days next preceding, but was authenticated as the law requires, it was held that the will ought to be established, notwithstanding his having been very unwell when he left home, if, afterwards, he was taken more dangerously ill, and died at the place where the will was made. Marks v. Bryant, 4 Hen. & M. 91. See also, Nowlin v. Scott, 10 Gratt. 65.

Same—Meaning of "Habitation"—It was held in Nowlin v. Scott, 10 Gratt. 64, that the word "habitation" in the act of 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 7, p. 377, in relation to nuncupative wills, means "dwelling house."

Same—"Last Sickness."—The principal case is cited in Reese v. Hawthorn, 10 Gratt. 553, 554.

Same—Same.—A nuncupative will to be valid must be made in the last sickness of the testator, when he is in such extremity that he has not the ability and opportunity to make a written will. Reese v. Hawthorn, 10 Gratt. 548. See Marks v. Bryant, 4 Hen. & M. 91.

Same—Omission of Part of Verbal Declaration—Effect.—Although in committing a nuncupative will to writing, within six days from the speaking of the testamentary words, a distinct and independent part thereof may be omitted, the residue of the will is not thereby vitiated. Marks v. Bryant, 4 Hen. & M. 91.

over land being laid before the gentlemen, they made the division, and directed that one part of the Hanover land, with the house on it, should receive 150 dollars from the child who should draw Marshalls, and the other part of the Hanover land, called Gilliams, should receive from Marshalls 450 dollars. The parties then proceeding to draw, Robert Page drew Gilliams, Charles C. Page drew the other part of the Hanover land having the house on it, and John F. Page drew Marshalls. With this result all were satisfied; and in the beginning of 1829, John F. Page took possession of Marshalls, and from that time made in his residence.

John F. Page was taken sick from home on the 17th of February 1833, when he was at Mansfield the residence of Thomas Atkinson in the county of Dinwiddie; and he died on the 4th of March 1833, without having returned to his habitation. In the time of his sickness, to wit, on the 24th of February 1833, he made a verbal disposition of his estate. And on the 28th of that month, the substance of what he said was committed to writing, as follows:

"We whose names are hereunto subscribed do certify that John F. Page of the county of King William, who is now extremely ill at the house of Thomas Atkinson in the county of Dinwiddie, called upon us on the 24th day of February 1833, and said, as he was too sick to have a will written and executed in the customary way, he wished, in the event of his death from the present illness, his property disposed of as 427 follows. *To his wife Catharine Page he gave his negro man Jemmy, woman Lucy, and a washerwoman to be hired by his brothers for the exclusive use of his wife, until one could be purchased by his brothers with convenience to his estate; which when purchased he also gave to his said wife. He said also, he gave to his wife his carriage and horses, and all his household and kitchen furniture; which negroes, carriage, horses and furniture he gave, and wished his wife to have, exclusive of the portions of his estate she would be entitled to as his widow under the law. The said John F. Page at the same time mentioned that his wife was pregnant; and that he wished his estate to be kept together and managed by his brothers, for the benefit of his wife and child, during his wife's widowhood, and in the event of his wife's marriage, they his said brothers to manage his child's part of the estate. The said John F. Page said at the same time, that he confirmed and ratified the division of his father's estate, both real and personal, among his brothers and himself, as it was made by the surveyor and gentlemen commissioners who divided it at their request. The said John F. Page also said, that if the child his wife was now pregnant with should live, and then die under age without lawful issue, he wished his brothers Robert and Charles Page to have the whole of his estate both real and personal, in equal portions, except the servants, carriage and horses, and furniture, specifically given to his wife as before mentioned. And then the said John F. Page said to one of the undersigned, he wished him to commit to writing what he had said concerning the disposition of the estate, and the same to be taken and published, in the event of his death, as his nuncupative will. Witness our hands, at Mansfield, this 28th day of February 1833.

Thomas Atkinson,
N. T. Page."

428 *On the 22d of April 1833, this writing was produced in the court of King William county, and ordered to be filed; and the widow of the decedent was directed to be summoned to the next court, to contest the will. The summons which issued was returned with an endorsement signed by the widow, stating that she acknowledged service of the summons, and did not intend to contest the will. On the 22d of July 1833, "the foregoing depositions of Thomas Atkinson and N. T. Page, purporting the nuncupative will" of the said John F. Page, were established by the court as his will, and ordered to be recorded. And administration with the will annexed was thereupon granted to Charles C. Page.

The posthumous child having died within ten days after its birth, a bill was filed by the widow in March 1835, in the circuit court of King William, insisting that the noncupative will was not legally admitted to record, because the witnesses Atkinson and Page did not testify orally in court to the supposed testamentary words, or their import, nor were their depositions taken, either in or out of court, to establish the same, but they merely proved, as the nuncupative will, the paper filed in court as aforesaid.

In May 1835, on the motion of Charles C. Page as next of kin of the decedent, a summons was again awarded against the widow by the county court, to contest, if she pleased, the proof of the nuncupative will. This summons being returned at the June term, and appearing to have been executed upon her, Thomas Atkinson and N. T. Page were then sworn in court, and deposed, that upon the 24th of February 1833, at Mansfield, at the house of Thomas Atkinson in the county of Dinwiddie, John F. Page did call upon the said deponents, and say in substance as follows: "As he was too sick" &c. (stating, in the precise terms of the writing first admitted to probat, every thing therein contained; except only, that instead of concluding in 429 the terms of *the writing, "And then the said John F. Page said to one of the undersigned, he wished him to commit to writing" &c. these depositions concluded with the statement, "And then the said John F. Page said to the said Thomas Atkinson," &c.) It also appeared to the court, by the oath of the said Thomas Atkinson and N. T. Page and of John C. Pollard, that the above testimony of Atkinson and N. T. Page, or the substance thereof, was committed to writing within six days after the said words were spoken by the said John F. Page, to wit, on the 28th day of February in the year 1833, at Mansfield in the county of Dinwiddie aforesaid, which writing is in the words and figures following, to wit: "We whose names are hereunto subscribed" &c. (reciting it). The court, having heard the testimony of the said witnesses and of sundry others, was of opinion that the said words deposed to as aforesaid, and committed to writing as aforesaid, were used by the said John F. Page deceased in his last sickness; that at the time of speaking said words, he was of sound and disposing mind, and of capacity to make a will; that he was suddenly taken sick from home, at Mansfield, at the house of Thomas Atkinson in the county of Dinwiddie, and died there without returning to his own habitation in the county of King William, never having left Mansfield between the time he was taken sick and his death; that during his last illness, in extremity, and in contemplation of immediate death, he spoke the said words, and called on Thomas Atkinson and N. T. Page to take notice that such words were his will; and that after speaking the said words, he desired Thomas Atkinson to commit to writing what he had said concerning the disposition of his estate, to be published, in the event of his death, as his nuncupative will. Whereupon it was ordered that the said nuncupative words be established as the true last will of the said John F. Page, and that the same be recorded.

430 *By the original bill in the suit in the circuit court, the first sentence of the court of probat was impeached by the widow, upon the ground that she had been prevented from making her defence in that court by fraud. And now, by an amended bill, she impeached the second sentence, upon the ground of her having been prevented from making her defence by accident. And the said bills alleged, that at the time of speaking the supposed testamentary words, the decedent was not of sound and disposing mind and memory; that he was not then (in contemplation of law) in his last sickness; and that the formalities of the law were not observed in reducing the will to writing, and in proving the same. It was insisted by the original bill, that real estate could not pass by a nuncupative will, and that the ratification by the nuncupative will of the division therein mentioned was invalid. The original and amended bills also submitted to the court the interpretation of the said will, in case the same should be established.

The next of kin of the decedent and of his child being Robert Page and Charles C. Page, they were made defendants, the former in his own right and as administrator de bonis non of Mann Page, and the latter in his own right and as administrator with the will annexed of John F. Page. They put in elaborate answers, denying the allegations whereby the will was impeached; insisting that the division of their father's real estate, having been fairly made, acted upon by the said John F. Page in his lifetime, and sanctioned by him in his last moments, ought not to be disturbed; and submitting their views as to the proper interpretation of the will.

Depositions were taken in the cause, from which it appeared, that the decedent had an attack of pleurisy, and the symptoms, on the 23d of February, were those usually seen in a severe attack of that disease; but about 8 or 9 o'clock the next morning, his fever had abated, and the symptoms of the disease become mitigated.

431 *Charles Page went that morning (being Sunday) to church in Petersburg, which was about 5 miles from Mansfield. While attending church, he was sent for in consequence of a change in the disease for the worse, and reached Mansfield between 12 and 1 o'clock. The will was made about 1 o'clock, and the decedent was then perfectly in his senses. The physicians who had been sent for at the same time that Charles Page was sent for, did not reach Mansfield until between 4 and 5, and he was then much worse. He remarked to the physicians, that his friends had become very much alarmed and thought he would die, but he did not think he would. One of the physicians, however, deposed that he was then incapable of dictating a will, and the other said he thought it doubtful whether he would survive the night or not. But the next morning (Monday the 25th) the symptoms had improved, and he was perfectly in his senses; and he was in his senses at intervals every day between the 24th and the day of his death, being usually better in the morning and worse in the afternoon, when his fever rose.

Pending the suit, Robert Page and Charles C. Page both died. As to the former, the suit was allowed to abate; it was revived against the executor, widow and child of the latter.

The cause having been removed by consent to the circuit court of Hanover, came on first to be heard on the bills, answers, exhibits, and examination of witnesses, and certain accounts were then directed. Upon the coming in of the commissioner's report, the case was again heard, and a decree made the 12th of October 1838, whereby the noncupative will was established, and the division therein mentioned confirmed. And the court adjudged and declared, that according to the true construction of the will, the plaintiff was not only entitled to the specific legacy therein bequeathed to her, (all of which it was admitted she had received, except 432 *the washerwoman directed to be purchased for her) but that the child of the testator being dead, she was entitled to the whole profits of the estate, real and personal, so along as she remained the widow of the testator, and from and after her marriage, to her legal rights in the estate as if he had died intestate, to which end the estate was by the will to be kept together.

On the petition of the representatives of Charles C. Page, an appeal was allowed.

Daniel for appellants. The object of the testator was to leave the widow to her legal rights, with the addition of certain specific legacies mentioned in the beginning of the will. The clause directing the estate to be kept together and managed for the benefit of the wife and child during her widowhood, if construed to give an estate during widowhood to the wife, would be inconsistent with the executory limitation to the testator's brothers in the event of the child's death under age without lawful issue.

The court has allowed the widow, during her widowhood, the whole estate, real as well as personal. Even if that had been the intention of the testator, it could not be effected by a nuncupative will; for such a will can create no interest in lands, much less an estate of freehold therein, which would be imported by a gift of the profits during widowhood. 1 Tho. Co. Lit. 200.

Lyons for appellee. There was no valid will. A nuncupative will made in the commencement of a disease, of which the testator ultimately dies, but dies after a considerable time has elapsed, and after rallying from time to time, so as to be perfectly capable from time to time of making a regular will in writing, is not made in the last sickness contemplated by the statute. To render a nuncupative will valid on the ground of its being made in the testator's last sickness, it must be made in the sickness of which he dies, and there must 433 *afterwards be no such recovery (total or partial) as may leave him capable in mind and body of executing a will in writing. The statute contemplates cases of necessity, of inability to make any other than a nuncupative will, and ought not to be extended beyond cases of that character. Prince v. Hazleton, 20 Johns. 502. The cases of Weeden v. Bartlett & c., 6 Munf. 123, and Winn v. Bob & others, 3 Leigh 140, though not precisely in point, may be referred to as confirmatory of the same principle. The testamentary words must also be uttered by the decedent in the prospect and contemplation of approaching death. The cases establish that the proximity of death, in point of fact, at the time of the testamentary words spoken is not sufficient, unless the testator was aware of and believed such proximity. And here the evidence does not shew such consciousness and expectation on the part of the testator, but the contrary. Then as to the two sentences of the court of probat. The first of these was plainly invalid. And the second was after six months from the time of speaking the testamentary words. Then the enquiry arises, whether the testimony, or the substance thereof, was committed to writing within six days after making the will. 1 R. C. 1819, p. 377, § 8. The words spoken were so committed to writing; but they are only a part of the testimony required by the statute to be put in writing. The testator must be of sound mind. He must call on some person present to take notice that such is his will. And the words must be spoken in the time of the last sickness, and in contemplation of death. These matters are indispensable to be proved, and the statute requires that the proof of them, the testimony respecting them, should be reduced to writing, as well as the testamentary dispositions. But all this part of the testimony is omitted in the writing.

II. A nuncupative will, it is admitted, cannot control the profits of real estate, 434 any more than it can pass the *land itself. But so far as the will could pass the estate of the testator, the decree adopted the true construction. What is there in this will to countenance the idea, that in the event of the child's death under age and without issue, the widow is to be stripped of all provision except the specific bequests? Yet that is the inevitable result of the argument which denies that the wife took an estate during widowhood in all the property which the will was competent to pass. For the limitation to the brothers, according to the terms of the will, must operate (in the contemplated contingency) upon all the testator's estate except the specific legacies to the widow; no more saving her share as distributee, than her supposed estate during widowhood. Such cannot be the meaning of the testator, because he has declared his intention to be not to give the widow less, but to give her more, than the law would allow in case of intestacy.

III. If the agreement between the three brothers for partition of the lands was not an agreement executed at the date of the nuncupative will, but merely executory, then the will could have no influence on it, since a nuncupative will cannot affect the title to lands; and the widow is entitled to her distributive share of the decedent's money invested in the tract called Marshalls. [Stanard, J. A nuncupative will may operate to convert money into land, because it may dispose of money.] However that may be, it cannot have the effect of substituting a dower interest of the widow in place of an absolute property in her distributable share.

Daniel in reply. According to the interpretation of the statute by this court, the will was made in the last sickness of the testator, and in contemplation of death. Marks and wife v. Bryant, 4 Hen. & Munf. 91. And it is plain that the meaning of the legislature was merely to require the testamentary words to be reduced to writing within the six days; not to require that the *testimony as to the 435 decedent's sanity, his intelligent and voluntary action, and the other particulars proper to be proved in court, should also be put in writing. What would be the use of such a requirement? And if there be any use, why was not a similar requirement made in the case of written testaments?

But it is too late for the widow to contest the validity of the will. She renounced all purpose to contest the probat, failed to appear though duly summoned, and the probat was in truth at the joint instance of herself and the other parties. She also accepted and enjoyed the legacies given her by the will, and never thought of a contest about the will until after the death of the child. This combination of circumstances would preclude her from a contest now, even if the will had been proved in common form merely. But the will was proved in the form in which, under the statutes of Virginia from 1748 to the present time, nuncupative wills have always been proved. 5 Hen. Stat. at large p. 457, § 11; 1 R. C. 1819, p. 379, § 18. That proof is very different from what is allowed in the case of written wills. The statute respecting probat of written wills authorizes the court to take the proof immediately, requiring no citation of the next of kin: the statute respecting nuncupative wills does provide for a citation of the parties interested, and invalidates the probat unless that provision be complied with. There is no reason for applying to the latter the statute in 1 R. C. 1819, p. 378, § 13, allowing bills in chancery to contest the validity of wills. And this statute should therefore be restricted to cases in which the probat may be in law, and has been in fact, ex parte and without notice; cases, namely, of wills in writing. In England, when a testament of personals is proved in solemn form after citation of the next of kin and distributees, they are in general precluded by such probat—"forever barred." 1 Wms. on Ex'ors 194. And the probat here of a nuncupative

436 *will, being what is considered in England a probat in solemn form, a bill in chancery ought not to be allowed after such probat, unless upon some ground of fraud or accident alleged and proved by the complainant. Nor is it at all material as to the first probat, whether it was strictly formal and regular; it is binding nevertheless, being the definitive sentence of a court of competent jurisdiction, never reversed or appealed from.

II. He contended that the true construction of the will was such as he insisted upon in opening. And III. as to the tract called Marshalls, he said, if the division could now be impeached, no division among heirs, not carried out in the most formal manner by deeds of partition, could ever be valid and obligatory. Besides, he remarked, if the division could be treated as a nullity, the testator's estate must be responsible for the rents and profits of the land during all the time he held it.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the following as the opinion of the court:

The court is of opinion that the act of assembly authorizing wills admitted to probat to be contested by a bill in chancery at any time within seven years thereafter, applies only to written, and not to nuncupative wills; and that the nuncupative will in question having been admitted to probat by a court of competent jurisdiction, after the appellee had been regularly summoned by its process to appear and contest the same, if she thought proper so to do, the sentence of the court of probat was binding upon her, and could not be impeached, except by appeal therefrom, or by a bill in equity founded upon her having been prevented by fraud or accident from making her defence in the court of probat. And the court is further of opinion, not only that the appellee was not prevented by fraud or accident from contesting the 437 said will in the court of *probat, but moreover that it clearly appears from the evidence in this cause, that the same was made by the testator in his last sickness, when he was of sound disposing mind and memory, and with the solemnities required by law. The court is consequently of opinion that there is no error in the decree of the circuit court, so far as the same sustains the validity of the said nuncupative will, and the sufficiency of the probat thereof, whether regard be had to the first or the last sentence of the court of probat: and is also of opinion that there is no error therein in recognizing the validity of the division made between the testator and his two brothers of their father's real estate, and the allotment to the testator of the place called Marshalls, and his accountability for his due share of the balance of the purchase money thereof. But the court is of opinion that the said nuncupative will was of no effect in law in relation to the testator's real estate, or the profits to accrue therefrom; and that, by its true construction, the testator intended that his wife should have in absolute ownership the slaves and other personal property specifically bequeathed to her, together with her legal rights in his estate as his widow, and nothing more. And the court is further of opinion that the testator's posthumous child inherited his real estate, subject to the widow's right of dower therein, and was entitled under the will (after payment of debts) to the slaves not specifically bequeathed, subject to the widow's life estate in one third thereof, and to distribution with the widow, in conformity to law, of the other personal estate not specifically bequeathed: and that upon the death of said child, his interest in the real estate descended to his paternal uncles, Robert and Charles C. Page, and his interest in the slaves and other personal property passed to the said Robert and Charles C. Page, under the executory bequest in their favour contained in said will. The court is therefore of opinion that the 438 *said decree of the circuit court is erroneous, so far as the same is incompatible with the rights of the parties as above expressed, and so far as the same gives costs to the appellee, instead of the appellants: and in these respects it is considered by the court that the said decree be reversed and annulled, and that the appellants recover against the appellee their costs by them expended in the prosecution of their appeal aforesaid here. And the cause is remanded to the said circuit court, for assignment to the appellee of her dower in the real estate, including Marshalls, after setting aside the order of abatement as to the defendant Robert Page, and reviving the suit against the representatives of his real estate; and for further proceedings in conformity with the views above declared, after a revival of the suit against the executor or administrator of the said Robert Page.

Weaver v. Vowles.

October, 1843, Richmond.

(Absent CABELL, P., and STANARD, J.)

Case Discussed.—The case of Seddon and others v. Tutop, 6 T. R. 607, cited, and the principle thereof discussed.

Former Recovery—Plea of*—Case at Bar.—In assumpsit for work and labour done, care and diligence bestowed, and materials provided, the defendant, besides the general issue, pleaded a former action for not performing the same promises, in which the plaintiff recovered damages for the non-performance of the same: the plaintiff replied that the promises were not the same identical promises in respect whereof the judgment was recovered, and tendered an issue, which was joined. At the trial, the plaintiff having given evidence on the general issue, the defendant, to sustain his plea of former recovery, gave in evidence the record of the former suit, the declaration *in which contained two counts, one for work and labour, care and diligence, and materials, as well as for goods sold, money lent, money paid, and money received; and the other upon an account stated. The defendant also gave in evidence the account filed in that case, which contained credits and charges up to the 24th of October 1835, "leaving out the building of a large barn, and work done on a new mill." The verdict and judgment in that case being for $630 53 cents, the plaintiff examined a witness, who proved that an account was settled with the defendant in October 1835, on which a balance of $630 53 cents was struck; that the account filed in the former cause was a copy of the account so settled; and that the settlement did not include the plaintiff's demand for work done on the barn or the new mill, charged in the account in the second case, but that this demand remained for future adjustment. It was farther proved, that on the trial in the former cause, the account not being then filed which was afterwards filed in the second suit, all evidence in regard to that account was excluded, and the plaintiff rested his case on the count upon an account stated, and relied upon the settlement before mentioned, shewing the said balance of $630 53 cents, and recovered upon that ground only. Thereupon the defendant moved the court to exclude from the jury all the evidence offered by the plaintiff in support of the items charged in the account filed in the second case, on the ground that he was precluded from recovering the same in this action by the recovery in the former suit, and that the demand of the plaintiff for the said sum of $630 53 cents recovered in the former suit, and for the items charged in the account filed in this case, was one entire demand, and could not be made the subject of two separate suits, and therefore the plaintiff was precluded by the recovery in the former suit from recovering in this suit. But the court overruled the motion, and a verdict was rendered for the sum found by the jury to be due upon the account filed in the second case. On a supersedeas to the judgment given on this verdict, the same was affirmed.

On the 9th of May 1837, Vowles sued out a writ of capias ad respondendum against Weaver, in the circuit superior court of Fauquier, in an action of trespass on the case. The declaration, which was filed the 3d of July 1837, set forth that Weaver, on &c. was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of 2500 dollars, for work and labour, care and diligence, and divers materials and necessary *things in and about the said work, by the said plaintiff to and for the use of the said defendant, at his special instance and request, before that time done and performed, bestowed and provided, and being so indebted, in consideration thereof promised &c. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit and setoff, on which issues were made up. He also filed a special plea in writing, setting forth, that theretofore, to wit, on the 9th of May 1837, the plaintiff impleaded the defendant in the circuit superior court of Fauquier, in a plea of trespass on the case on promises, to the damage of the plaintiff 5000 dollars, for not performing the same identical promises and undertakings in the declaration mentioned, and such proceedings were thereupon had, that afterwards, on the same day and year aforesaid, the plaintiff, by the consideration and judgment of the said circuit court, recovered in that plea against the defendant 630 dollars 53 cents, with interest from the 24th of October 1835 till paid, for his damages which he had sustained on occasion of the not performing the same identical promises and undertakings in the said declaration mentioned, and 17 dollars 80 cents costs, whereof the said defendant was convicted, as by the record thereof still remaining in the said circuit court would appear, which said judgment yet remained in full force, nowise reversed, satisfied, or made void; and this the defendant was ready to verify by the said record. To this plea the plaintiff replied, that the several promises and undertakings in the declaration mentioned were not, nor was any of either of them, any of or any one of the same identical promises and undertakings, for and in respect whereof the said supposed judgment in the said plea mentioned was recovered, as the defendant had in his said plea alleged; and this the plaintiff prayed might be enquired of by the country. The defendant took issue on the replication.

441 *A trial being thereupon had, the jury found for the plaintiff the issues joined, and assessed his damages to 914 dollars 91 cents with interest from the 1st of April 1836 till paid. The defendant moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant him a new trial; but the court overruled the motion, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the damages and interest found by the jury, and the costs of the suit.

By a bill of exceptions filed by the defendant and made part of the record, it appeared that the following proceedings took place at the trial.

The plaintiff exhibited the accounts filed by him in the cause, and gave evidence to prove the items therein stated. One of these accounts, marked A, contained various items for work done and materials furnished by the plaintiff in erecting a barn for the defendant. The only date specified in the account was that prefixed to the first item, namely, October 1, 1832. The other account, marked B, was for work done and materials furnished by the plaintiff in erecting a new mill for the defendant; and in this account also, the only date specified was that prefixed to the first item, namely, October 24, 1835. The aggregate of the charges contained in these two accounts exceeded the amount of damages found by the jury.

The defendant, to sustain his plea of former recovery, gave in evidence a transcript of the record (including the writ of capias ad respondendum) in a former suit between the parties to this action. The writ was sued out on the 31st of December 1836. The declaration contained two counts; the first of which charged, that on &c. Weaver the defendant was indebted to Vowles the plaintiff in the sum of 5000 dollars, "as well for work and labour, care and diligence, and divers materials and necessary things in and about the said work, by the said plaintiff to and for the use of the 442 said defendant, at his special instance and request, *before that time done, performed, bestowed and provided," as for divers goods &c. sold and delivered, and divers sums of money lent &c. paid &c. and had and received &c. and being so indebted, the said defendant in consideration thereof promised &c. The second was a count in the common form upon an account stated. The cause was tried upon the plea of non assumpsit, and the jury found that the defendant did assume upon himself in manner and form as the plaintiff against him had complained, and they assessed the plaintiff's damages, "by occasion of the nonperformance of those assumptions," to 630 dollars &c. with interest &c. (as stated in the special plea).

The transcript so given in evidence by the defendant, though certified by the clerk of the circuit court as a complete copy of the record, did not contain any account shewing the items of the plaintiff's demand in that suit. The bill of exceptions, however, after setting forth in hæc verba the transcript given in evidence by the defendant, stated that the said defendant also gave in evidence "the account filed in that case by the plaintiff, in these words: 1830, March 23." &c. This account consisted, first, of various items for goods furnished and cash paid by Weaver (the defendant) to Vowles (the plaintiff), commencing the 23d of March 1830 and terminating the 23d of October 1835, amounting in the aggregate to 914 dollars 60 cents; and secondly, of various credits to Vowles, commencing the 23d of March 1830 and terminating the 24th of October 1835, amounting in the aggregate to 1545 dollars 13 cents, and so exceeding the amount of Weaver's charges against Vowles by 630 dollars 53 cents, (the sum for which the verdict and judgment in the first action were rendered). These credits to Vowles, except the last item, were chiefly for goods furnished by him to Weaver. The last item was as follows: "1835, Octo.

24. By additional credits for mill-
443 wright work *and other charges up to this date, leaving out the building of the large barn, and work done on a new mill, not completed, which were not taken into this account, $1345. 75."

The plaintiff examined a witness, who proved that he, during the period of that account, acted as the agent of the defendant, and kept his books. That he entered on the defendant's book an account between him and the plaintiff, which contained various items of debit and credit. That, in the month of October 1835, the plaintiff came to the house of the defendant to have a settlement of their accounts. That the aforesaid account entered on defendant's book was produced, and admitted to be correct. That the plaintiff then exhibited a statement of other charges against the defendant, for work done in repairing the merchant mill and saw mill of the defendant, and building a horse mill, and containing an item for the board of defendant's nephew, and possibly other items. That these bills were examined by the defendant, and the sum of 1345 dollars 75 cents being admitted to be due on account thereof, a credit for that sum was entered on the book, the debits were taken from the credits, and a balance of 630 dollars 53 cents struck, either on the book or on a separate piece of paper, as the balance due to the plaintiff by the defendant upon the settlement then made. That the said settlement did not include the plaintiff's demand for work done on the barn, or the new mill, charged in the accounts filed in this case. That the account filed in the former cause, and before referred to, is a true copy, taken from the defendant's books, of the account then settled. That it was agreed by the parties, that the said sum of 630 dollars 53 cents was due by the defendant to the plaintiff upon the settlement aforesaid. And that the plaintiff's demand for work on the barn and new mill remained for future adjustment between the parties.

444 *The plaintiff further proved, that when the former cause was called for trial, he offered to file the accounts now sued on, and to embrace both demands in that suit; but the defendant's counsel objected to their being then filed unless the plaintiff would continue the case, which he refused to do, and all evidence in regard to those accounts was consequently excluded. That on the trial in the former case, in consequence of those accounts being thus excluded, no evidence was given upon the count for work and labour, but the plaintiff rested his case on the count upon an account stated, and relied upon the settlement before mentioned, shewing the said balance of 630 dollars 53 cents, and recovered upon that ground only.

And thereupon the defendant by his counsel moved the court to exclude from the jury all the evidence offered by the plaintiff in support of the items charged in the accounts filed in this case, on the ground that he was precluded from recovering the same in this action, by the recovery in the former suit; and that the demand of the plaintiff for the said sum of 630 dollars 53 cents, recovered in the former suit, and for the items charged in the accounts filed in this case, was one entire demand, and could not be made the subject of two separate suits, and therefore the plaintiff is precluded by the recovery in the former suit from recovering in this suit. But the court overruled the said motion, being of opinion that the demand for the said sum of 630 dollars 53 cents was so far separate and distinct as to form the ground of a separate action. To which decision of the court the defendant excepted.

On the petition of the defendant, a supersedeas was awarded to the judgment.

Standard, for plaintiff in error. The principle by which the court must be regulated where a prior recovery for the same cause of action is pleaded, is this:

445 *Where the declaration in the second suit is framed in such a manner as that the causes of action may be the same with those in the first, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to shew that they are not the same. Lord Bagot v. Williams, 3 Barn. & Cress. 235; 10 Eng. C. L. R. 62. The declaration in the first suit between these parties assigns the cause of action in the very same words as the declaration in the second; and the damages claimed in the first suit were sufficient to cover the amount of both recoveries. Prima facie therefore, according to the authority already cited, the cause of action in the second suit was embraced by the first. How does the plaintiff meet the onus probandi thus cast upon him by the law? He adduces parol evidence to shew that the first recovery was had, not upon the count for work and labour, but solely upon the count alleging an account stated. Such evidence directly contradicts the record of the first recovery, in which a general verdict is found for the nonperformance of the assumptions charged in the declaration. The evidence is therefore inadmissible. The party may, it is true, offer parol evidence to shew that the work and labour for which the first recovery was had was not the same with, or did not include, the work and labour for which the recovery is sought in the second action; for such evidence does not contradict the record: but it is not competent to shew by parol, either that no evidence was submitted to the jury in the first suit in reference to the claim for work and labour, or that the jury did not pass upon that evidence. Field v. Gibbs &c., 1 Peters' C. C. R. 155; Reed v. Jackson, 1 East 355; Hess's ex'or v. Heeble, 6 Serg. & Rawle 57. In the case of Seddon v. Tutop, 6 T. R. 607, (which will probably be relied upon by the other side) it is to be inferred from the whole report, though it is not expressly stated, that the first verdict was found, in terms, upon only one of the counts in the declaration,—the count, namely, upon the promissory note. This inference is confirmed by the remarks of Bayley, J., in Bagot v. Williams, 10 Eng. C. L. R. 64. Moreover, the first verdict in Seddon v. Tutop was not found on issue joined between the parties: it was merely an assessment of damages on a writ of enquiry, the defendant being in default. On both grounds, the case is distinguishable from the present.

II. But if the parol evidence here can properly be admitted, it does not prove that any cause of action in the second suit had not been legally passed upon in the first. For, where evidence offered to prove one of several demands is excluded by the court, and the plaintiff suffers a verdict to pass on the whole case, the judgment on such verdict is a bar to subsequent actions for that demand. Smith v. Whiting, 11 Mass. R. 445. The distinction is between those cases in which the demand is never submitted to a jury, but is abandoned at or before the trial, by striking out the count, or discontinuing the action upon the record as to such demand, so that no evidence is offered in relation to it; and those cases in which the claim is not abandoned at or before the trial, but the issue joined thereupon, together with the other issues in the cause, is submitted to a jury, and a general verdict is suffered to pass on the whole case. If a claim is submitted to a jury, and they disallow it, or allow less than the plaintiff is entitled to recover, or overlook part of his demands, a verdict and judgment thereon will furnish a conclusive bar to a second action for the same cause. Brockway v. Kenney, 2 Johns. R. 210; Irwin v. Knox, 10 Johns. R. 365; Platner v. Best, 11 Johns. R. 530; Hess's ex'or v. Heeble, before cited, 1 Wms. Saund. 207, note 2. In like manner, where a submission to arbitration embraces a particular demand as to which no evidence is offered before the arbitrator, that demand is nevertheless barred by an award in general terms on the matters submitted. Smith v. Johnson, 15 East 213; Dunn v. Murray, 447 9 Barn. & Cress. 780; 17 Eng. C. L. R. 498; Wheeler v. Van Houten, 12

Johns. R. 311. The evidence here does not shew that on the trial in the first action no attempt was made to adduce proof in support of the first count. Further, the evidence to support a declaration upon a stated account (supposing the subject to be work and labour done and materials furnished) would equally support a declaration for work and labour done and materials furnished. The acknowledgment by the defendant, of the justness of an account containing such items, would certainly prove that the work was executed for him, and the materials furnished to him, by the plaintiff.

III. Where the plaintiff's claim is entire and indivisible, he cannot be allowed to bring suit and recover upon a part, and afterwards recover in a separate action for the residue. Jackson v. Colver, 1 Wend. 487; Guernsey v. Carver, 8 Wend. 492; Smith v. Jones, 15 Johns. R. 229; Farrington &c. v. Payne, 15 Johns. R. 432; Seddon v. Tutop, 6 T. R. 607, and remarks of lord Kenyon in that case; Lord Bagot v. Williams, 10 Eng. C. L. R. 62; Markham v. Middleton, 2 Str. 1259. But a claim upon an account for goods sold and delivered, all due, is indivisible. Guernsey v. Carver and Markham v. Middleton, ubi supra. The same principle must equally apply to a general account for work and labour done. In both cases, a judgment for part of the amount is a bar to any action for the remainder. Upon an analogous principle, where a plaintiff brings separate actions for demands which might have been embraced in a single suit, such actions will be consolidated at his costs. Cecil v. Brigges, 2 T. R. 639; Hutson v. Lowry &c., 2 Va. Cas. 42; Willard v. Sperry, 16 Johns. R. 121. The whole demand of the plaintiff here, embraced in his two actions, was due at the time the first action was brought.

448 *Morson for defendant in error.

The pleadings and issue in this case cannot be distinguished from the pleadings and issue in Seddon v. Tutop. The replication here is the proper one, according to the authority of 3 Chitty's Pl. (7th american edi.) p. 1158.

The principle on which a second action is barred by the judgment in a former, is expressed in the maxim nemo vexari debet bis pro eadem causa. 1 Starkie's Evid. (american edi. of 1837) p. 214. To make the plea of judgment recovered a defence, the same fact must have been in issue. The test of identity is, whether the same evidence will support both actions. Id. p. 221, 2. Apply that test to the present case: Would the same evidence support the issues joined in the two actions? Under our statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128; § 86, p. 510, the bill of particulars is the true and only exponent, in the action of indebitatus assumpsit, of the matters in issue between the parties. The plaintiff cannot put in issue, under a general count in that action, any matter of demand not set out plainly in his bill of particulars. The reason is, that such a count gives the defendant no information whatever as to the precise nature of the matters demanded. Here the bill of particulars filed in the first action is wholly different from that filed in the second; and the second bill is for matters which, on the face of the first, were expressly stated to be excluded. Admitting for the present that we cannot go out of the record to ascertain whether the matters claimed in the two suits were or were not the same, how is it shewn that the bill of particulars in the first action was no part of the record? No case or dictum on that subject is to be found in our reports: and this must have been because it was never doubted that the account which the statute directs to be filed with the declaration, to supply that notice which the declaration failed to give, was thereby constituted part of the declaration and of the record.

449 If this be so, and the account *in the first suit was properly a part of the record, the omission of the clerk to certify it as such is immaterial. It is set out in the bill of exceptions taken at the trial of the second action, and is therein stated to be "the account filed in the first case by the plaintiff." Taking it as a part of the record, it appears by the record that no part of the demand recovered in the second action was claimed or put in issue in the first.

Supposing, however, that the bill of particulars is no part of the record, the question is as to the competency and effect of the parol evidence adduced by the plaintiff. Estoppels are odious in law, and must be strictly pleaded and strictly proved; they will never be favoured by presumption. 1 Chitt. Plead. 238. Opinion of Tucker, P., in Craddock v. Turner's adm'x, 6 Leigh 129, 130, 131. It may perhaps be questionable whether, in aid of estoppels, parol averments and proofs are admissible; but they certainly are to rebut them. 3 Phill. Evid. (Cowen & Hill's edi.) 834, 838; 8 Wend. Rep. 9, 22, 36; 10 Wend. Rep. 82; The king v. Wheelock, 5 Barn. & Cress. 511; 11 Eng. C. L. R. 291, 2; The king v. Wick St. Lawrence, 5 Barn. & Adolph. 526; 27 Eng. C. L. R. 120; Cleaton v. Chambliss, 6 Rand. 92. In fact it is conceded on the other side, that if our evidence does not contradict the record, it is admissible. Does it contradict the record? Let it be admitted that a claim for work and labour was in issue and passed upon in the first suit, and let all evidence be rejected which tends to disprove that fact: still, by the concession of the other side, we may shew that the work and labour so claimed and passed upon was not the same with that for which the present action is brought. And is not that precisely and distinctly shewn by the evidence on the part of the plaintiff?

If the case of Seddon v. Tutop be fairly considered, and not frittered away by metaphysical distinctions and refinements, it is absolutely conclusive against the plaintiff *in error. It does not appear, as suggested on the other side, that there was a nolle prosequi in the first action in that case, as to the demand on the open account; and it does appear on the contrary, from lord Kenyon's remarks, that there was no withdrawal of any count in the first action. The authority of that case is fully recognized in every elementary writer, and in all the subsequent cases. Many of these are collected in 1 Starkie's Evid. (edi. of 1837) p. 223, note 1. Neither does Seddon v. Tutop introduce any new principle; the remarks of the judges shew that they were merely reaffirming a principle long before settled. That case is stronger than the present: because there both the demands might have been proved and recovered in the first action; whereas here, the first bill of particulars not comprising the matters demanded in the second suit, those matters could not have been proved or recovered in the first suit.

The general explanation of all the authorities cited on the other side is this: they refer either to cases in which the very demand in the second suit was in issue and passed upon in the first, or to cases in which the demand in the second suit was parcel of a demand, indivisible in its nature, which had been claimed in the first. To all such cases the principle is properly applicable, that a defendant shall not be vexed at the plaintiff's pleasure by repeated litigation for the same cause of action.

II. Not only were the claims upon which the two actions here were brought, distinct and separate in points of fact, but they were properly separable. One was a demand for an ascertained sum; the other was an open account, not at all adjusted. They arose upon different contracts, at different times, for different work and labour. A stated account (which was the ground of recovery in the first action here) is just as distinguishable from an open account 451 for work and materials * (the ground of claim in the second action), as the promissory note in the case of Seddon v. Tutop from the open account there.

III. As to the cases respecting the consolidation of actions, cited on the other side, it is sufficient to remark, that such consolidation is discretionary with the court, and the discretion, though exercised to prevent useless vexation and expense to the defendant, will never be employed to bar the plaintiff from his recovery of a just debt. There is no room for its application except where the plaintiff has several suits pending at the same time, for matters which might have been embraced in one. The case of Hutson v. Lowry &c. (a case of prohibition to a justice) has nothing to do with this. But the jurisdiction there exercised was also nothing more than a discretion, of the same kind with that exercised in consolidating actions.

Patton in reply. The question here is, whether the demand in the last suit was a matter in issue in the first,—a matter as to which the plaintiff might, if he had thought proper, have given evidence before the jury.

Whether evidence was or was not in fact given, is immaterial.

Mr. Morson has earnestly contended, in order to evade the force of the authorities sustaining this proposition, that the bill of particulars is to be regarded as a part of the record, and as the only exponent of the matters in issue in the first suit. He has also contended, that the matters demanded in the two suits were wholly distinct in their nature, and though capable of being united in one action, were not necessarily to be so united. Let us examine these propositions.

The idea that the bill of particulars is a part of the record, is certainly novel. In England, either a statute or long usage has established the practice of requiring from the plaintiff a bill of particulars in 452 certain actions, *for the purpose of giving the defendant notice of the matters demanded by the plaintiff, so as to enable him to prepare for his defence. Our statute has merely established, in the action of indebitatus assumpsit, a similar rule. It is a rule of evidence,—of the competency and admissibility of evidence,—introduced for the benefit and protection of the defendant, and which he may waive at his pleasure. The declaration may be so particular as to dispense with any account: and where an account is necessary, it may be filed at any time before the trial, early enough to give notice to the defendant. That the account is no part of the declaration, is shewn by the cases of Moore v. Mauro, 4 Rand. 488, and Fitch v. Leitch, 11 Leigh 471. The effect of the statute is not, as contended, to limit the extent of the issue,—to confine it to the claims set forth in the account,—but merely to restrict the plaintiff in the admission of evidence. The stamp laws of England have precisely the same effect. Suppose a bill of exchange is excluded from the jury because unstamped: can it be said that there has been nothing in issue in the suit, because no bill of exchange has been produced, though one was declared on? Yet how is that case distinguishable from this? But if the account be a part of the declaration, the want of it in a proper case ought to be, and must necessarily be, ground of demurrer to the declaration. But who ever heard of a demurrer for that cause? [Morson. I have very little doubt that a demurrer would lie.] Again, suppose that an action of general indebitatus assumpsit goes to trial without any account filed (which is a very frequent case), and a verdict is found for the defendant: according to Mr. Morson's argument, the verdict and judgment would operate nothing, but the plaintiff might at his pleasure bring a new suit, on the ground that as there was no account filed in the first action, nothing had ever been in issue there. In Hurst v. Watkis, 1 Campbell's Rep. 68, it was held *that the plaintiff was restricted to his bill of particulars, and if he failed to sustain that, he might be nonsuited: but that if the defendant chose to make another account of the plaintiff evidence in the cause, the plaintiff might recover upon such other account, the declaration and issue being sufficiently general to embrace it. The same principle may be deduced from the case of Bell v. Puller, 2 Taunt. 285. These cases shew conclusively that the bill of particulars has no sort of effect to change or limit the issue, but merely to protect the defendant against being surprised by the introduction of evidence as to matters of which he had received no notice. In Jackson v. Wood, 8 Wend. 44, the bill of particulars is said by senator Seward to be no part of the record. The case of Ross v. Milne (to be reported in 12 Leigh) shews, that even after a trial on the merits, exceptions filed at the trial, and verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, if no cause of action is shewn in the declaration, the judgment will be reversed, and cannot be aided by the statute of jeofails. But if nothing is in issue where no bill of particulars is filed, there is no cause of action shewn by the plaintiff, and the judgment (on the authority of Ross v. Milne) must be reversed. This is the necessary consequence from the argument on the other side. [Morson. The statute of jeofails would aid the case after verdict, because, where no account is filed, there is merely a defective statement of the cause of action. In Ross v. Milne, the declaration shewed that the plaintiff had no cause of action at all.]

But there is no evidence whatever to shew that the bill of particulars in question was filed with the declaration in the first suit. It is not certified as a part of the record by the clerk of the court below, but on the contrary is excluded. And from the parol testimony it may be inferred that it never was introduced in the first suit until the trial, and was then introduced only 454 as evidence *to support the count upon an account stated, by connecting it with testimony to shew that the defendant acknowledged its correctness.

But it is argued, that because the bill of particulars professes to be only a partial statement of the plaintiff's demands,—because it expressly states that the plaintiff had other demands against the defendant for other work and materials,—therefore those other demands were not, and could not have been, included in the causes of action in the first suit. This is manifestly a non sequitur, even supposing that the bill of particulars was only a partial statement and notice of the plaintiff's demands. But that is not the true character of the bill of particulars. It is an account of a demand for certain items amounting to 630 dollars, besides and in addition to the demand for work done upon the barn and the new mill. And the bill of particulars was a sufficient notice of the nature and character of all those causes of action. Moore v. Mauro and Fitch v. Leitch (already cited) are full and direct authorities to that point. To these may be added the case of Hatchett v. Marshall, Peake's N. P. Cas. 172. Objections to a bill of particulars, that it is not full and minute in its specifications, are received with very little favour. The case of Milwood v. Walter, 2 Taunt. 224, and other cases cited in Tidd's Pract. (new edi.) p 304, shew, that a mistake in the date of an item, and other variances between the bill of particulars and the evidence adduced by the plaintiff, if they have no effect to mislead the defendant, will not be permitted to operate the exclusion of the evidence. The question always is whether the bill of particulars be sufficient to answer the purpose of notifying the defendant on what account he is sued, and of enabling him to prepare his defence to the action.

If then the demand here asserted in the second suit was a demand embraced by the declaration and issue in the first, and the plaintiff might have adduced evidence 455 *to sustain it under his bill of particulars, the case of Bagot v. Williams, and the other cases cited for the plaintiff in error, establish that this second action cannot be maintained, whatever be the reason that the demand was not recovered in the former action,—whether the failure to adduce evidence, the rejection of evidence adduced, or the insufficiency of proof to establish the plaintiff's case. The only exception is where the plaintiff withdraws the demand from the consideration of the jury, by entering a nolle prosequi as to such demand, or striking out the count in which it is asserted: and that exception does not apply to this case.

In Seddon v. Tutop, the damages found by the first verdict were to an amount corresponding with the promissory note declared on in the first count. It would seem that the verdict there was not general, but restricted in terms to the demand asserted in that count, exclusively of the other. That the finding was in effect merely on the count for the promissory note, is at all events the understanding of the various judges who have subsequently noticed the case: see particularly Bagot v. Williams and Hess's ex'or v. Heeble (before referred to) and Snider &c. v. Croy, 2 Johns. Rep. 227. And in no other way is it possible to reconcile Seddon v. Tutop either with the subsequent cases in England, or the cases in this country, which in terms admit its authority. Further, the form of the issue in Seddon v. Tutop is relied upon both by Erskine arguendo, and by lord Kenyon in his judgment: the issue was, whether the plaintiff had or had not already recovered damages for the identical promises declared on in the second action; and upon the evidence it was clear that he had not. Here the issue is different, and perfectly coincides with the issue in Bagot v. Williams, Hess's ex'or v. Heeble, and other cases cited and relied on by mr. Stanard.

We do not impugn the authority of Seddon v. Tutop, for we do not think it necessary: but it may be remarked, 456 *that it has certainly gone as far in encroaching upon the general principle that a defendant is not to be twice vexed for the same cause of action, as the courts should ever go in any well regulated system of jurisprudence. The case may be sustained on the grounds upon which it is rested by the court which decided it, and it may be an authority in cases precisely similar; but the principle of the decision should not be extended to other cases, different in circumstances.

In this case the first verdict is general; it finds damages for the nonperformance of the assumptions in the declaration mentioned: and shall it be inferred from parol evidence, that the damages were not found for the nonperformance of all those assumptions, but only of some or one of them? Brockway v. Kenney distinctly decides that such evidence is not admissible for any such purpose.

In point of fact, as well as by intendment of law, the demand of the plaintiff in the second suit was in issue and passed upon in the first. Under the count upon the account stated, no bill of particulars was necessary (Fitch v. Leitch, 11 Leigh 471); and the bill of particulars filed specifies the items of demand asserted in the other count. Why should the plaintiff take the trouble to file an account of those items, if he did not sue for them or seek to recover them in that action? Moreover, the evidence in the record shews that the plaintiff did offer to prove those very items before the jury, but that his evidence was excluded. [Morson. It does not appear that any attempt was made to sustain that count before the jury: the statement is simply that no evidence was given in support of it.]

But we contend that the causes of action in the two suits here were the same, because we insist that the two counts in the first suit were themselves for one and the same cause of action, and not for identity as to this subject (laid down in the passage quoted from 1 Starkie on Evid. 222, 3, and the case there referred to of Hitchen v. Campbell, 2 Bl. R. 827,) is, whether the causes of action alleged in several counts or declarations would be sustained by the same evidence. Here, the same evidence which would sustain the second count in the first declaration would also have sustained the first count. Proof of a stated account for work and labour will sustain a declaration in indebitatus assumpsit for the performance of the work and labour; which is the character of the first count in the first action, and of the declaration upon which the present verdict and judgment have been recovered. The plaintiff might have recovered under the second count, for all that was due him at the time of the suit brought, by proving the defendant's acknowledgment of an account embracing all the items; as on the other hand he might have recovered all under the first count, either by the very same evidence, or by distinct evidence that the work had been done and the materials furnished at the defendant's request. The fact that an account was stated between the parties embracing only a part of the plaintiff's demand, did not sever that part so as to make it a distinct and independent cause of action; the claim was still entire and indivisible, although the plaintiff might thereby be enabled to prove different items of it by different kinds of evidence,—to prove one portion by shewing that the defendant acknowledged his account for that portion, and the residue (or the whole, if the plaintiff thought proper) by shewing that he had performed the labour and furnished the materials for the defendant.

In addition to the cases already cited shewing that an entire demand cannot be severed, the case of Morgan v. Plumbe, 9 Wend. 287, may be referred to.

PER CURIAM. The judgment is affirmed.

*Muire &c. v. Smith.

November, 1843, Richmond.

(Absent CABELL, P.)

Ferry*—Inquisition—Evidence—Construction of Statute.—Construction of the act in 2 R. C. 1819, p. 261, ch. 238, which provides for the impanelling of a jury to say whether, in their opinion, public convenience will result from the establishment of a proposed ferry, and for the return of this opinion to the county court, "who thereupon, as well as upon any other evidence that may be offered, shall have full power to establish such ferry." The finding of the jury in such a case is merely evidence, and the weight of it, under all the circumstances, a matter for the discretion of the court.

Same—Jurors—Preconceived Opinion—Quashing Inquisition.—Upon the return of the certificate of a jury, that, in their opinion, public convenience would result from the establishment of a proposed ferry, evidence is introduced, 1. Of one of the jurors, who proved, that before he was sworn, he had made up an opinion that the ferry would be a public convenience; that he thought it probable he might have expressed his opinion, though he did not recollect to have done so; that he had, before he was sworn, signed a petition for the said ferry; and that, at the time he was sworn, he was uninfluenced by the said opinion, and prepared to render an impartial verdict. 2. Of another juror, who proved the like facts with regard to himself, and also that he had expressed his opinion. 3. Of another juror, who proved the same facts with regard to himself, that the second had proved with regard to himself, and also that he had circulated a petition for the ferry. Upon this evidence the county court quashed the finding of the jury, and the circuit court reversed the judgment of the county court. HELD, the judgment of the circuit court is right.

Case at Bar Distinguished.—This case distinguished by JUDGES BALDWIN and ALLEN from Hunter v. Matthews, to be reported in 12 Leigh, where the proceeding was under the act concerning mills, in 2 R. C. 1819, p. 225, ch. 235.

On the 14th of March 1837, an order was made by the court of King & Queen county, for the justices to be summoned to appear on the first day of the succeeding term, to act on an application of Lewis Smith for the *establishment of a ferry from his lands in King & Queen county to his lands in King William county. At May term 1837, Francis Row, Thacker Muire and William Newman moved the court for leave to enter themselves defendants to the application, which motion the court overruled, and the defendants excepted. Thereupon, "it appearing to the satisfaction of the court that the said Smith is the owner of the lands on both sides of the Mattapony river at the place proposed for the said ferry, and that public roads have been established through the same, and it also appearing to the court that the magistrates have been duly summoned, and that notice of this application has been given by advertisement set up at the door of the courthouse for two successive court days," the court made an order directing the sheriff to impanel a jury of twelve disinherited freeholders, to view the place proposed for the establishment of the ferry, and say whether, in their opinion, public convenience would result from its establishment. The opinion of the jury impanelled under this order not being certified, but on the contrary it appearing by the return of the sheriff that they could not agree, and it further appearing that one of the jurors impanelled was not a freeholder, the court, at July term 1837, quashed the said return of the sheriff, and directed him to impanel another jury. On the same day that this order was made, Row, Muire and Newman were permitted to enter themselves defendants. The jury impanelled under this order certified, that after being first sworn, they viewed the place proposed for the ferry, and on their oaths they believed that public convenience would result from the establishment of the ferry. This opinion being returned by the sheriff to the court, the case was continued from term to term until the 14th of November 1837, when Row, Muire and Newman moved the court to quash the proceedings, (among other reasons) because some of the jurors were *interested, and had made up and expressed an opinion upon the question of the convenience of the ferry, before they were sworn upon the jury. Thereupon three of the jurors were introduced as witnesses, and this question was propounded to them: Had you made up and expressed an opinion upon the question of the public convenience of the ferry proposed to be established by the applicant in this case, before you were sworn upon the said jury? The applicant objected to the question being answered, but the court overruled the objection, being of opinion that the evidence was admissible, and the same was admitted accordingly: to which opinion the applicant excepted. The court, on hearing the case, quashed the proceedings, and gave judgment in favour of the defendants against the applicant for their costs. To which judgment the applicant also excepted. This last bill of exceptions set forth, that Row, Muire and Newman moved the court to quash the proceedings, 1st, because no public roads had been established through the lands of the applicant, from and to which the ferry was proposed to be established; 2dly, because no notice of the application had been given according to the requisitions of the statute; and 3dly, because some of the jurors had made up and expressed an opinion before they were sworn, and were interested. To sustain this third objection, the defendants introduced, 1. William Todd, one of the jurors, who proved, that before he was sworn, he had made up an opinion that the ferry would be a public convenience; that he thought it probable he might have expressed this opinion, though he did not recollect to have done so; that he had, before he was sworn, signed a petition for the said ferry; and that, at the time he was so sworn, he was uninfluenced by the said opinion, and prepared to render an impartial verdict. 2. William B. Todd, another of the said jurors, who proved the same facts with regard to himself that William Todd *proved with regard to himself, and also that he had expressed his opinion. And 3. Elias Watlington, another of the said jurors, who proved the same things with regard to himself that William Todd had proved with regard to himself, with the additional facts that he had expressed his opinion and had circulated a petition for the ferry. Upon this evidence the court sustained the motion of the defendants, and quashed the proceedings.

A supersedeas being awarded to this judgment, the circuit court reversed the same with costs, and sent back the cause to the county court, to be in the same plight and condition it was in on the 14th of November 1837, for further proceedings to be had therein.

On the petition of Muire and Newman (Row having died) a supersedeas was awarded to the judgment of the circuit court.

Daniel for defendant in error. The bill of exceptions to the opinion of the court overruling the motion of Row, Muire and Newman for leave to enter themselves defendants, not shewing any ground for the motion, or that these parties had any interest in the case, this court must intend that the judgment of the county court was right. Besides, these same parties were afterwards admitted to contest the application for the ferry, and actually succeeded in the county court. The last bill of exceptions sets forth three grounds for the motion to quash the proceedings; but as the evidence introduced relates only to the third, that alone need be noticed. It is, that some of the jurors who found the inquest had previously made up and expressed opinions respecting the public convenience of the proposed ferry. If those jurors had been examined on the voir dire in a case of life and death, and had given the same testimony which they here gave as to their own impartiality, that testimony would have been sufficient to admit them on the jury.

462 *There being no counsel for the plaintiffs in error, Leigh, as amicus curiæ, suggested that the case of Hunter v. Matthews, decided not long since by this court and to be reported in 12 Leigh, involved a question as to the impartiality of jurors in a mill case, and the decision there might have an important bearing upon this case.

Daniel. There is a material difference between the statutes relating to the establishment of mills and of ferries. The functions of the jurors, and the effect of their finding, are very different in the two cases. On an application for leave to build a mill, the inquisition in favour of the applicant is conclusive until evidence is adduced to impugn it; and if the application be not contested, the court has no discretion to refuse leave to erect the mill and dam. But in regard to the application for leave to establish a ferry, the statute directs that the jury shall enquire whether the proposed ferry will be a convenience to the public; and if they find that it will, the court, upon their opinion to that effect certified under their hands, and upon such other evidence as may be offered, shall have full power to establish such ferry. The jury in this case find no verdict affecting any right of property in third persons; they assess no damages; their certificate is merely of their opinion on the question of convenience to the public, and that opinion may be aided and supported by other evidence to be examined at the discretion of the court. The opinion is conclusive under no circumstances. In a mill case, other evidence cannot be resorted to in aid of the inquest, but only to contradict it. Tate's Dig. 2d ed. p. 695, note k. and opinions there cited. The question, then, whether a juror who has concurred in the opinion that a proposed ferry will be a public convenience, is strictly disinterested and impartial, is of very inferior importance to a similar question in relation 463 *to a juror in a mill case, and the evidence of unfitness ought to be much stronger, and indeed irresistible, to require that the finding in the former case should be set aside on that ground.

BALDWIN, J. It cannot be doubted that a court under whose authority an inquest has been taken, with a view to the action of the court upon the subject of the enquiry, has the power to quash the inquisition for good cause shewn. Its authority to set aside the inquisition and to award a new writ is analogous to the supervision and control which it exercises in regard to the verdict of a jury upon a venire facias or a writ of enquiry. And as a motion for a new trial is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, it is equally so in relation to the motion to quash an inquisition. In either case, the court interposes where manifest injustice has been done by the decision of the jury; or without enquiry into the merits of that decision, where the jury or the successful party has been guilty of gross misconducts in the proceeding, affecting the purity of the administration of justice, or where the jury has been so constituted, without the default of the party complaining, as to render it improbable that a fair and impartial investigation has been had. The same general principles, therefore, must govern an application to set aside a verdict of a jury, whether that verdict has been rendered upon a trial in court, or upon an inquest in pais. And the force of an objection to the verdict, founded merely upon a defect in the constitution of the jury, must depend upon several considerations; the want of an opportunity to make the objection before the decision of the jury; the effect of that decision upon the determination of the cause; and the weight of the objection itself.

When a jury is impanelled in court, the parties have an opportunity to challenge either the array or the polls; and if they do not avail themselves of it, the 464 *court will not listen to objections to jurors after the rendition of their verdict, unless under very peculiar circumstances. But upon an inquest in the country, the right of challenge does not exist; and of course objections, whether to the array or the polls, cannot be made until after the return of the inquisition. On the other hand, a verdict rendered in court is conclusive upon the parties while it stands; whereas an inquisition made in the country may, under the peculiar law by which it is governed, be either conclusive, in the whole or in part, or merely evidence for the information of the court, and liable to be overcome or strengthened by other evidence. If an inquisition be conclusive on any material point, objections to the array or the polls, if sufficiently cogent, may be entertained upon a motion to quash; though not such as would induce the court to set aside a verdict upon a venire facias, because the proper subjects of previous challenge. It does not follow, however, that the court will quash an inquisition for every objection which would have been a cause of even principal challenge upon a venire facias; for an important distinction arises from the consideration, that a challenge, when well taken, has the effect of preventing a vice in the constitution of the jury, and though it should be improperly sustained, can be productive of but little inconvenience; whereas the quashing an inquisition is necessarily attended with delay and expense, besides the hazards of annulling a decision of the jury correct upon the merits. It would therefore be no sufficient ground for quashing an inquisition, however conclusive in its character, that one of the jurors was a seventh cousin of one of the parties, or his steward or attorney, or of the same corporation with him, or "a witness named in the deed;"

though these appear from the books to be causes of principal challenge, sufficient in themselves, and not submitted to the determination of triers, as is the case 465 with challenges that go only to *the favour. The objection ought, I think, to be such as to raise not merely a strong suspicion, but strong reason to believe the juror acted under an improper bias, or that unfairness had been practised in the constitution of the jury; either of which might be inferred where one of the jurors was the son or the brother of the successful party, or had a pecuniary interest in the result. The rule, it seems to me, may be safely asserted, that an inquisition will not be quashed for objections to jurors which would not be good cause of principal challenge upon a venire facias; but the converse of the proposition cannot, I think, be true, that whatever is good cause of principal challenge upon a venire facias is a fatal objection to an inquisition. A juror upon an inquest can no more be challenged after verdict than a juror upon a venire facias; and it surely cannot be true that the inquisition found may be challenged, because the party had not an opportunity to challenge the jurors who found it.

In the case before us, though the objections to some of the jurors might have furnished grounds of challenge, inasmuch as the evidence tends to shew decided expressions of opinion before they were sworn, in relation to the matter of enquiry; still I think the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, ought to have overruled them upon the motion to quash the inquisition. It by no means follows that a juror was partial because he had expressed an opinion; for his belief may not have been the result of malice or prejudice, but of his own knowledge of the subject. Besides, the only evidence on this point is that of the very jurors themselves, introduced for the purpose of proving that they were not impartial at the time they were sworn. It is obvious that such evidence, if at all admissible, ought to be received with great caution and circumspection, by reason of the difficulty of contradicting it, and the encouragement which it holds out to 466 tampering with jurors *after the rendition of their verdict. Nor ought it to be at all garbled, as it would be in this case, by rejection (what might perhaps be disregarded upon an examination on the voir dire with a view to a challenge) the emphatic declarations of the witnesses, that they stood, when called to be sworn on the jury, uninfluenced by what had occurred, and prepared to render an impartial verdict.

If therefore the inquisition were conclusive in its effect, the evidence just noticed would, in my opinion, furnish no good reason for quashing it. But the whole ground of objection is removed when we look to the character of the inquisition, which is in no wise conclusive. The proceeding is under the act concerning ferries, 2 R. C. 261, by which the duty of the jury is confined to the question whether public convenience will result from the establishment of the ferry applied for, and the merits of the application are to be decided by the court, upon the inquisition, and any other evidence which may be offered. The finding of the jury, therefore, in such a case is merely evidence, and the weight of it, under all the circumstances, a matter for the discretion of the court. There may be cases of corruption or unfairness in the constitution of the jury, calling upon the court to quash the inquisition as a decisive mark of its reprobation; but minor objections, pointing only to a want of qualification or a liability to prejudice on the part of one or more of the jurors, should be directed, not against the competency, but the credibility of their verdict.

Hunter v. Matthews is not an authority to rule this case. It was there held that an inquisition upon an ad quod damnum, on an application to erect a mill and dam, was properly quashed, on the ground that two of the jurors had been of the jury which had found a former inquisition upon the same matter of controversy. The proceeding there was had under the 467 act concerning *mills &c., 2 R. C. 225, by the provisions of which the inquisition is conclusive as to the value of the acre of land located for the abutment of the dam, and the damage to the proprietors above and below; and is also conclusive against the applicant, where it finds that the mansion house &c. of any proprietor will be overflowed, or the health of the neighbours annoyed. And the decision in Hunter v. Matthews was founded upon the conclusive effect of the inquisition.

My opinion is, that the county court erred in quashing the inquisition found by the jury, and also erred in quashing the other proceedings. The objection that notice of the application for the ferry was not given according to the requisition of the statute, and the further objection that no public road had been established through the lands of the applicant, from and to which the ferry was proposed to be established, are wholly unwarranted, if not contradicted, by the record, and would seem to be founded upon the erroneous idea that the evidence of those facts ought to have been spread upon the record, though the case was never heard before the court upon the question whether the ferry ought to be established, which was arrested by the successful motion to quash the proceedings.—The judgment of the circuit court reversing that of the county court seems to me perfectly correct.

ALLEN, J. In Hunter v. Matthews, two of the jurors had been of the jury which found an inquisition on a former writ of ad quod damnum in the same cause. This, according to the authorities, was a cause of principal challenge; and for that reason, and because the inquisition in a mill case was in some respects conclusive upon the rights of both parties, I was of opinion that the inquisition there should be quashed. Neither of those reasons applies to the present case. The objection to the jurors did not constitute a cause of principal *challenge: it concluded to the 468 favour; in which case the court, in the exercise of a sound legal discretion, must determine upon the validity of the objection. Even where the juror has given a former verdict, lord Coke says, "that in this or other like cases he that taketh the challenge must shew the record, if he will have it take place as a principal challenge; otherwise he must conclude to the favour." From which it may be inferred that a cause of principal challenge, growing out of the act of the juror, depends not so much on the character of the objection as on the kind of proof. The fact of his having rendered a former verdict in the same cause, and the influence it would be likely to exert in a subsequent trial, could not be affected, whether proved by the record, or otherwise: yet in the latter case the challenge concludes to the favour, and is addressed to the discretion of the court. See, upon this subject, Co. Litt. 157 b., 3 Thomas's Co. Litt. 479, and 3 Black. Comm. 363. It is not said in either of these authorities that the expression of an opinion constitutes a cause of principal challenge; and from the instances put, and more especially from the remark of lord Coke cited above, it is clear that the objection concludes to the favour. The same doctrine is to be found in 21 Viner's Abr. 266, and 2 Rolle's Abr. 657.

Viewing the objection here as constituting a challenge concluding to the favour, I think the court should have overruled it, after the inquisition had been found. According to the uniform course of decision, the testimony of jurors going to impeach their own verdict, if admissible, should be received with great caution. If such testimony be resorted to, full weight should be given to the whole of it. Here the jurors declare that their opinions previously formed had no influence on their finding.

But there is another reason why, in this 469 peculiar case, there can be no propriety in quashing the inquisition. *It concludes nothing. It is at best but the opinion of twelve men, given under oath, as to the question of public convenience. The court, upon that as well as the other evidence, establishes the ferry or rejects the application. In a mill case, the finding of the inquisition that the health of the neighbourhood will be annoyed is conclusive; and so in respect to the quantum of damages for the land condemned. In these respects it differs widely from an inquisition of the kind under consideration.

I think therefore that the county court erred in quashing the inquisition, and that the judgment of the circuit court reversing that of the county court should be affirmed.

The other judges concurring, judgment of circuit court reversing that of county court affirmed.

*Cocke v. Haxall's Ex'x.

November, 1843, Richmond.

(Absent CABELL, P., and STANARD,* J.)

Fraudulent Conveyances—Recordation of Deed—Case at Bar.—It was the intention of the legislature, in the act of 1792 regulating conveyances, (1 vol. of old revised code, p. 157, § 2, 4.) to require a deed of trust or mortgage of personal estate to be recorded in the general court, or in the court of the district, county or corporation in which the grantor resided. Therefore where a deed of trust of personalty, dated the 15th of July 1812, stated the grantor to be of Henrico county, and the trustee and cestui que trust to be of the town of Petersburg, and the deed was never recorded in Henrico but only in Petersburg, and there was no evidence to shew that either at the date of the deed or of its recordation in Petersburg, the grantor resided in that town, HELD, the deed so recorded is void as to the grantor's creditors.

By deed bearing date the 15th of July 1812, purporting to be between John Bell "late of the town of Petersburg but now of Henrico county" of the first part, George Keith Taylor of the said town of Petersburg of the second part, and William and Henry Haxall of the same town of the third part, it was recited that Bell was indebted to William and Henry Haxall the sum of 10,000 dollars, the payment of which he desired to secure, and be conveyed to Taylor, in trust for that purpose, certain articles of household and kitchen furniture and liquors mentioned in a schedule annexed to the deed. In the court of hustings of Petersburg on the first of March 1813, this deed was acknowledged by Bell, Taylor and William Haxall, and with the schedule annexed admitted to record.

In 1817, Benjamin Cocke, a creditor of William & John Bell & Co. brought an 471 action in the superior court of *Prince George county to recover his debt. In that action, judgment was obtained against John Bell on the 27th of April 1818, for 1634 dollars 72 cts with interest from the 1st of June 1815, and costs; and on the 3d June 1818 a writ of fieri facias was issued upon the judgment, and levied in the city of Richmond on property which William and Henry Haxall claimed to have been conveyed by the deed of trust aforesaid. Upon a bill by them in the court of chancery at Richmond, the sale was enjoined, and the property restored to the possession of Bell. Under an order of the court of chancery, William Haxall, the surviving partner of William and Henry Haxall, entered into bond on the 8th of November 1831, with Philip Haxall his surety, in the penalty of 4000 dollars, conditioned to pay to Cocke all such costs and damages as might be awarded him in consequence of the injunction, in case the same should be dissolved. This injunction was dissolved on the 25th of June 1833. And thereupon Cocke brought an action upon the injunction bond, in the circuit court of Henrico, against Clara Haxall as executrix of Philip Haxall. Issues were joined upon the pleas of conditions performed and non damnificatus, and at the trial the facts appeared to be as herein before stated. It was admitted that before the dissolution of the injunction, John Bell had died insolvent.

In this state of the case, the plaintiff moved the court to exclude from the jury the deed aforesaid, upon the ground that at the time of its execution Bell the grantor resided in the county of Henrico, and the property conveyed by it was also in that county, and the deed had never been recorded in Henrico, and was therefore void as to the plaintiff. But the court overruled the motion, and permitted the deed to be given in evidence to the jury as a deed properly and duly recorded. To which opinion the plaintiff excepted.

472 *The plaintiff also moved the court to instruct the jury that the deed was void as to him, unless by the evidence it should appear to the satisfaction of the jury, that either at the date of the deed, or of its recordation in the hustings court of the town of Petersburg, the grantor resided in that town: but the court refused to give the instruction, and the plaintiff excepted to this opinion also. A second instruction was moved and overruled, the purport of which it is unnecessary to state.

A verdict being found for the defendant, judgment was rendered thereupon; and to that judgment a supersedeas was awarded.

The cause was argued by Stanard and Lyons for the plaintiff in error, and by C. and G. N. Johnson for the defendant in error. In the course of the argument, the counsel cited and commented upon the following statutes and decisions: Act of 1748, in 5 Hen. Stat. p. 409, § 4; Clayborn's ex'or v. Hill, 1 Wash. 177; Note to Moore's ex'or v. The Auditor, in 3 Hen. & Munf. 235; Act of 1785, in 1 vol. of Old Rev. Code, p. 15, 16, ch. 10, § 2; Act of 1792, in same volume p. 157, ch. 90, § 2, 4, and p. 158, § 8; Moore's ex'or v. The Auditor, 3 Hen. & Munf. 232; Hodgson v. Butts, 3 Cranch 140; Bond v. Mewburn and others, 1 Brock. 316; Act of 1814, Sess. Acts of 1813-14, p. 36, ch. 10, § 8; Act of 1819, 1 R. C. p. 364, ch. 99, § 11; Lane v. Mason, 5 Leigh 520.

ALLEN, J., delivered the following as the opinion of the court:

The court is of opinion, upon a consideration of the various acts of the legislature for regulating conveyances, and especially of the acts of 1705, ch. 21; 3 Hen. Stat. 318,—of 1710, ch. 13; 3 Id. 517,—of 1734, ch. 6; 4 Id.

397,—of 1748, ch. 1; 5 Id. 408, and of 1785, ch. *62; 12 Id. 154, that it was the intention of the legislature, in the act of 1792, to require a deed of trust or mortgage of personal estate to be recorded in the general court, or in the court of the district, county, city or corporation in which the grantor resided. And it appearing from the recital in the deed in the bill of exceptions referred to, that the grantor John Bell resided in Henrico county, and the deed having been recorded in the corporation of Petersburg; such deed, so recorded, was void as against the creditors of said grantor. The court is therefore of opinion, that the court below erred in permitting said deed to go in evidence to the jury, and in refusing to give the first instruction asked for by the plaintiff. Therefore the judgment is reversed with costs, and the cause remanded, with instructions to exclude the said deed from going in evidence, if no other testimony should be adduced on the trial, and to give the first instruction as prayed for by the plaintiff, if the same should be again required.

474 *Wade's Heirs v. Greenwood & Wife.

[40 Am. Dec. 759.]

(Absent CABELL, P.)

Specific Performance*—Unrecorded Conveyance—Grantor's Creditors—Lost Deed—Costs.—In 1814 land was sold, possession thereof delivered, part of the purchase money paid, and a contract made to pay a further part when a lawful right should be conveyed. In 1820 a bill was filed by the vendor and his wife (who claimed to have inherited the land from her father) against the vendees and their assignee, asking specific execution of the contract. The bill also made defendant a non-resident, who, it was alleged, had formerly owned the land, and conveyed it to the father by a deed which was accidentally destroyed before it was placed on record. The assignee in his answer said, he had heard a report that the father mortgaged the land to secure a debt which was yet unpaid. He professed his readiness to pay the balance due from him to the vendees, upon receiving a title to the land, and a release of the mortgage, if there was one. The nonresident defendant, though proceeded against by publication, put in no answer. It was proved by a witness, that in 1794 the nonresident defendant conveyed the land to the father of the female complainant; that the deed was acknowledged before three witnesses, and delivered to one of them to have it recorded; and that it was accidentally burnt while in his possession. In 1830 a decree was made for specific execution. During all this time the vendees and their assignee, and the heirs of the latter, continued to hold possession of the land; none of them asked a rescission of the contract; and it did not appear that there was any such mortgage as was mentioned in the answer. Upon an appeal by the heirs of the assignee, HELD. 1. That as the conveyance to the father, though never recorded, and afterwards destroyed, was effectual against the grantor to vest the legal title in the father, and the great lapse of time since that conveyance, in connexion with the uninterrupted possession of the father and those claiming under him, furnished a sufficient presumption against any claim on the part of the grantor's creditors, the decree for specific execution was, under the circumstances, proper. 2. That as there was no record of the said conveyance, a commissioner should be directed to execute another deed from the grantor to the appellants. 3. That as the ancestor of the appellants was not bound to take the title until the existence and validity of the said conveyance *had been judicially ascertained, and as the burthen of establishing these facts devolved on the vendors, they should be decreed to pay the costs.

Same—Personal Decree against Heirs of Vendee—Rule.

—Where a suit is brought against a vendee for specific execution, and pending the suit he dies, and the same is revived against his heirs, they are not liable to a personal decree: the decree should merely be, that unless they pay the purchase money and interest within a period to be prescribed, the land shall be sold.

Sale of Land—Enforcement of Vendor's Lien—Time for Redemption.†—In a suit by a vendor against the vendee's heirs, to subject lands to sale by virtue of the vendor's lien for his purchase money, it is, in general, an improper exercise of discretion to decree an immediate sale without allowing any time for redemption, or to decree the sale to be made for cash. If circumstances exist which render it expedient to sell forthwith and for cash, such circumstances should be disclosed by the record. If there be a decree to sell forthwith and for ready money, in a case in which nothing appears to call for or justify a departure from the general rule, the decree will for this cause be reversed.

By deed dated the 18th of September 1777, James Dejarnett and wife conveyed to George Mitchell a tract of 400 acres of land in the counties of Halifax and Pittsylvania, being chiefly in the former. Dejarnett acknowledged the deed, and his wife was privily examined, in the court of Halifax county on the day of its date, and the same was thereupon admitted to record.

By a deed of the 19th of December 1786, in the names of Mitchell and his wife, the land was conveyed to John Welch. This deed was proved in the court of Halifax county, on the 21st of June 1787, by two witnesses as to Mitchell; but his wife did not appear to have been privily examined.

By a deed of the 25th of April 1788, in the names of Welch and his wife, the land was conveyed to Daniel Roberts. This deed was also proved in the court of Halifax county by two witnesses; but the wife of Welch did not appear to have been privily examined.

Daniel Roberts sold the land to Redmon Cody, who died leaving a daughter Nancy his only child and heir. She intermarried with Bartlett Greenwood.

476 *On the 28th of May 1814, articles were executed between Hardwick Shearing and Moses Shearing of the one part, and Bartlett Greenwood of the other part, whereby the two former acknowledged that they had bought the land of Greenwood and received possession from him, and (in addition to what was stated in the articles to have been paid) were to pay Greenwood 100 dollars upon his making to them a lawful right to the land, and 300 dollars more the 25th of December 1816. Hardwick Shearing and Moses Shearing afterwards transferred their right to the land to Henry Wade.

In 1820, Greenwood and wife filed their bill in the superior court of chancery at Lynchburg, against Roberts, the purchasers from Greenwood, and Wade their assignee, setting forth, that the father of the female complainant died during her minority, seized of the land, and the sale by the plaintiffs was made before they had knowledge of the facts in regard to the title; that Roberts received full payment for the land, and executed to Redmon Cody a deed for the same in due form of law; that Cody was put in possession of the premises pursuant to the deed, and he and those claiming under him have held the possession 33 years uninterruptedly; that the deed executed by Roberts to Cody was delivered over by Cody to Haynes Morgan esquire, then a practising attorney in the county court of Pittsylvania, to offer to the said court for probat, and Morgan deposited the deed with his own papers in his office, which was consumed by fire in the year 1787, before the period for holding said court had arrived; that Roberts resides out of the commonwealth, and the Shearings have also gone out of the state, having previously sold their interest in the land to Wade, and put him in possession thereof. The bill prayed a conveyance of the title of Roberts, and that the land be decreed to be sold, and the complainants paid the 400 dollars remaining due, with interest thereupon.

477 *Wade, in his answer, admitted that he contracted with the Shearings at the price of 800 dollars, of which he had paid at different times 400 dollars, leaving the residue unpaid. He said, he had heard a report that Cody in his lifetime mortgaged the land to secure a debt to John M'Rae of Petersburg, and that the debt was yet unpaid. He professed his readiness to pay the balance due from him to the Shearings, upon receiving a title to the land, and a release of the mortgage, if there was a mortgage; but entertaining strong doubts as to the plaintiffs' title, he was not willing, he said, to part with his money until those doubts were removed.

Moses Shearing also answered, stating, that by an arrangement made by him with Hardwick Shearing, the latter had taken the benefit and burthen of the contract.

The cause was proceeded in by publication against Roberts and Hardwick Shearing, and the bill as to them was taken for confessed.

Chancellor Taylor referred the title of the plaintiffs to a commissioner, to be by him regularly deduced for 50 years. The commissioner reported the evidence of James Dejarnett, that he was in possession of the land by purchase as early as 1770, and then held the original patent for the same; and the evidence of James Montgomery, that after Dejarnett sold the land, he (Montgomery) saw the original patent in the hands of Welch, who then owned the land. The deposition of Thomas Self was also taken the 15th of May 1822. He deposed, that about 28 years before, he rented the land from Redmon Cody, and he then understood from Daniel Roberts and said Cody, that he (Roberts) had sold the land to Cody; that at the time of the conversation of Roberts and Cody, or some short time before, the last payment was made by Cody to Roberts; that the deponent was called on by the parties to witness a deed from Roberts to Cody; that the deed was acknowledged in the presence of deponent and of Haynes Morgan and Reuben Comp-478 ton, and *all three witnessed the same; that Morgan undertook to have it recorded, and took it in possession for that purpose; that Morgan's house was burnt some time afterwards; and that the deponent had never been called on to prove the deed for the purpose of having it recorded.

The defendant Wade died pending the suit, and the same was revived against his heirs.

On the 19th of May 1830, the chancellor decreed, that upon mrs. Greenwood's uniting with her husband in the relinquishment of her right to the land by such good and sufficient deed to the heirs of Wade as counsel learned in the law should advise, and delivering the same to the said heirs or some one of them, if he or they would receive it, but if not, depositing it with the clerk of the court for their use, the heirs of Wade should pay unto the plaintiffs the sum of 400 dollars with interest thereon from the 25th of December 1814, and their costs by them about their suit expended. And the court further decreed, that in case default should be made in such payment upon the execution and delivery of the said deed as aforesaid, the defendants, or such of them as might have the possession of the land, should deliver the possession thereof to the marshal of the court, and that the marshal, after having advertised the time and place of sale for four weeks in some newspaper printed in the town of Lynchburg, at the front door of the court-houses of Halifax and Pittsylvania counties on some court day, and at some public place near the premises at least ten days before the sale, should proceed upon the premises to sell by way of public auction, to the highest bidder for ready money, the land aforesaid, or so much thereof as should be sufficient to pay off and discharge the said principal money, interest and costs, and the expenses attending the said sale, and should pay the proceeds thereof, after de-479 fraying the expenses attending the same, into one of the banks *at Lynchburg to the credit of the suit, subject to the future order of the court, and report his proceedings to the court. And liberty was reserved to the defendants Daniel Roberts and Hardwick Shearing, respectively, to shew cause against the decree at any time within seven years, upon their appearing and answering the bill.

A deed from Greenwood and wife was executed to the heirs of Wade, and the wife's privy examination and acknowledgment, as well as the husband's acknowledgment, duly certified by two justices of the peace, and the deed tendered to one of the heirs, and deposited with the clerk of the court, as directed by the decree.

An appeal was allowed from the decree, on the petition of Wade's heirs, who insisted that the plaintiffs had not made a lawful title agreeably to the contract, and under the circumstances ought not to have been permitted to sell the land, at the sacrifice which a doubtful title must occasion, for the balance of the purchase money, which, by the terms of the agreement, was not to be paid until after a good title was made: that at all events no sale should have been decreed, but upon terms of repaying to the heirs of Wade the amount paid by them to Shearing, and by Shearing to the plaintiffs, and rescinding the agreement, which could not be performed on the part of the plaintiffs: and that, before any sale could justly be asked, an enquiry should have been directed to ascertain whether the mortgage mentioned in the answer of Wade ever existed, or still remained.

Garland for appellants. This being a bill for specific execution, the court will not decree such execution if it would be inequitable to do so. Cabell, P., delivering opinion of court in Bryan v. Lofftus's adm'rs, 1 Rob. 16. Here there is reason to apprehend disturbance by Roberts or his heirs. Self has not proved any delivery of the deed by Roberts, or by his author-480 ity; and if he had, *it is at least questionable whether a single witness would be sufficient to establish the fact, seeing that the deed could only be admitted to record upon proof by three witnesses. It must be considered a case of a clouded title, under which, if a sale be made, the land will be sacrificed; which a court of equity does not permit. Gay v. Hancock & others, 1 Rand. 72. Mere possibilities, it is true, constitute no objection to a specific execution; as where, from the length of time, it is impossible to discover in whom the legal title is. But when a considerable, a rational doubt exists, notwithstanding the court inclines to the opinion that a good title can be made, specific execution will not be decreed. Stapylton v. Scott, 16 Ves. 272. The court never decrees such execution where the title is involved in difficulties. 1 Fonbl. Eq. 190; Marlow v. Smith, 2 P. Wms. 198; White v. Foljambe, 11 Ves. 337. A purchaser will not be compelled to take a doubtful title. Roake v. Kidd, 5 Ves. 647; Lowes v. Lush, 14 Ves. 547; Franklin v. Lord Brownlow, 14 Ves. 550; Sloper v. Fish, 2 Ves. & Beames 145. Although the court thinks the title good, yet if it be doubtful, specific execution will be denied. Cooper v. Denne, 1 Ves. jr. 565; Jervoise v. Duke of Northumberland, 1 Jac. & Walk. 549.

A party seeking specific performance should shew that he is not himself in default, and that he has taken all proper steps towards performance on his part. 2 Story's Equity, p. 81, § 771; 1 Fonbl. Eq. book 1, ch. 6, § 2; Milward v. Earl Thanet, 5 Ves. 720, note; Moore v. Blake, 1 Ball & Beatty 68, 9; Pratt and others v. Carroll, 8 Cranch 471; Colson v. Thompson, 2 Wheat. 336, 341; Brashier v. Gratz and others, 6 Wheat. 528. Here a conveyance should have been directed of the title of Roberts, or at least the plaintiffs should have been required to execute an indemnifying bond against any title outstanding in him or derived through him, and against the other defects alleged by the vendee.

481 *The decree is also erroneous in allowing interest on the purchase money from a date anterior to the execution of the conveyance by Greenwood and wife, and in allowing them their costs. It is moreover harsh in directing the land to be sold for ready money, upon four weeks notice. A reasonable time should have been allowed for paying the money, and the sale should have been upon a reasonable credit.

Patton and C. Johnson for the appellees. No objection is made in the pleadings to going on and completing the contract, if a good title can be made. Now Roberts had a title which would have enabled him to sustain his right to this land against all the world, before his conveyance to Cody. And after that conveyance, the execution of which is clearly proved, the title of Roberts was fully vested in Cody. Had Cody brought a writ of right to recover the land against Roberts, and adduced in that case the same evidence that is exhibited here, it would have been abundantly sufficient to entitle him to recover. After such a lapse of time without any creditor of Roberts or subsequent purchaser from him being heard of, it must be presumed that the title is unexceptionable. This principle of presumption equally applies to the objection that the wives of two of the parties who successively conveyed the land did not join in the conveyances.

The sufficiency of the title is to be ascertained at the time of the decree, not at the time of suit brought. Hepburn v. Auld, 5 Cranch 262. The cases of Lyddal v. Weston, 2 Atk. 19, Sperling v. Trevor, 7 Ves. 497, Hillary v. Waller, 12 Ves. 251, Halsey v. Grant, 13 Ves. 73, and Horniblow v. Shirley, Id. 81, shew the kind and degree of doubt or defect which will prevent specific execution, and what will be considered as sufficiently guarded against by the vendor's warranty. The cases shew that where the party resisting specific execution is in possession of the land, there will be a stronger disposition on the part of the court to compel specific execution (notwithstanding small objections to the title), and to leave the party to his remedy on the general warranty in his deed. Buckle v. Mitchell, 18 Ves. 111, shews that remote and merely contingent objections to the title will not avail. Here the husband and wife have executed and tendered a deed conveying the land. And therefore the question suggested in Howel v. George, 1 Madd. C. R. 1, whether specific performance of the husband's contract for the sale of the wife's land can be decreed, so as to require him to procure her to join in the conveyance, need not be considered.

As the vendee was in possession of the land, he was properly required to pay interest on the purchase money. The contract expressly provided a particular day for the last payment; and where that is the nature of the contract, and the party has also had possession of the land, interest will go upon the purchase money from that day.

There is nothing in the record from which it can be inferred that the discretion of the chancery court was improperly exercised in decreeing a sale for cash upon four weeks notice. Under the circumstances of this case, and after the delay of payment which had already occurred through the vendee's default, it would have been improper to allow further delay, especially when the sum to be raised was so inconsiderable. Moreover the case of Manns v. Flinn's adm'r, 10 Leigh 93, shews that this is no ground for reversing the decree.

483 *ALLEN, J., delivered the following as the opinion of the court:

The court is of opinion, that it appears from the evidence that Daniel Roberts did convey the land in the bill and proceedings mentioned to Redmon Cody, the ancestor of the female appellee: that such conveyance, though never recorded, and afterwards lost or destroyed, was effectual as against the grantor to vest the legal title in said Cody: and that the great lapse of time since said conveyance, in connexion with the continued and uninterrupted possession of the land by Cody and those claiming under him, furnishes a sufficient presumption against any claim on the part of the creditors of said Daniel Roberts. The court is therefore of opinion, that as the appellants have continued to hold possession of the property, and have not asked for a rescission of the contract, it was proper, under the circumstances of the case, to decree a specific performance of the contract; and that in this there was no error in the decree. But the court is further of opinion, that the ancestor of the appellants was not bound to take the title of the appellees until the existence and validity of the said conveyance from Daniel Roberts had been judicially ascertained; that the burthen of establishing those facts devolved upon the appellees; and therefore that they should have been decreed to pay the costs. The court is further of opinion, that as there is no record of the conveyance from Daniel Roberts, a commissioner should have been directed to execute a deed from him to the appellants. The court is further of opinion, that under the authority of Tibbs &c. v. Matthews &c. decided in this court on the sixth day of May 1829, *it was 484 wrong to decree personally *against the appellants, who, as heirs of the vendee, were not liable to a personal decree. The decree should have been, that unless they paid the said debt and interest within a period to be prescribed, the land should be sold. And the court is further of opinion, that in a suit to subject lands in the hands of heirs to sale, for the equitable lien of the vendor for unpaid purchase money due from their ancestor, or for the debt of the ancestor, it is, in general, an improper exercise of discretion to decree an immediate sale without allowing any time for redemption, and to decree a sale for cash: and that if circumstances exist which render it expedient to sell forthwith and for cash, such circumstances should be disclosed by the record. In the case under consideration, nothing appears to call for or justify a departure from the general rule; and the court is therefore of opinion, that there was error in directing the marshal to take possession of the land, and to sell forthwith and for ready money. It is therefore decreed, that so much of the said decree as conflicts with this opinion be reversed, and that the appellants recover against the appellees their costs here expended; that the said decree be affirmed for the residue; and that the cause be remanded, with instructions to be finally proceeded in according to the principles above declared.

(Absent CABELL, P.)

Writ of Right—Pleading—Nonjoinder of Demandants Must Be Pleaded in Abatement—Cases Approved.†—

Upon a writ of right by three demandants, it appears at the trial of the mise, that the tenement demanded descended to the demandants and their two infant brothers from their mother, and that those two infants successively died without issue, and were survived by their father as well as by the demandants: HELD, 1. That upon the death of the infant who first died, his share of the tenement descended to his four brothers, without regard to the father; and upon the death of the other infant, the share which he derived by descent from the mother passed in like manner to the three brothers, but the share which he derived by descent from his brother (1-4th of 1-5th) descended to his father. 2. That according to the principles established in Garrard &c. v. Henry &c., 6 Rand. 110, and Linton and others v. Bartly and others, 9 Leigh 444, the fact of the father's having so become interested as tenant in common with the demandants (not having been pleaded in abatement) cannot prevent the demandants from recovering so much of the tenement as they shew title to, namely, all except that fourth of a fifth.

*In Tibbs &c. v. Matthews &c. the court of appeals adjudged the decree to be erroneous in this, that it was "personal against the heirs, and not conditional (as it ought to have been) that unless they pay the money, the lands be sold" &c.—Note in Original Edition.

†Writ of Right—Pleading—Misjoinder of Demandant—Platter in Abatement.—In Bell v. Snyder, 10 Gratt. 365, it is said the nonjoinder of the omitted heir was clearly a matter in abatement, and was not therefore available on the mise joined; and the cases of Green v. Lifer, 8 Cranch 220, Garrard v. Henry, 6

Same—Same—Nonsuit—When Proper to Set Aside.—A nonsuit in a writ of right having been suffered under a misapprehension on the part of the demandants and their counsel as to the legal effect of an instruction given at the trial, HELD, the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, should, on the motion of the demandants, have set aside the nonsuit; and this not having been done, the judgment overruling such motion was reversed.

Same—Same—Plea of Several Tenancy—When Pleaded.—Within what time the plea of several tenancy should be pleaded in a writ of right.

On the 13th of March 1824, Benjamin P. Walker, Samuel J. Walker and Isaac W. Walker, by John M. Walker their father and next friend, sued out of the circuit court of Buckingham county a writ of pæcipe quod reddat against Meshack Boaz, William Phelps and James Rogers, which writ was returnable to the rule day in April following, and was then returned executed *on Boaz, but not on the other 486 tenants. At that rule day, the demandants filed their count demanding a tenement of 272 acres of land. A new writ having been issued against Phelps and Rogers, and returned executed upon them, at April term 1825 "came the parties, and by their consent" an order of survey was entered. At April term 1826, again "came the parties by their attorneys, and by their consent" a new order of survey was entered. Under the first order, a survey was made the 22d of April 1825; under the last, the 7th of September 1826.

At September term 1826, before the case had been called, the tenants tendered a plea, that Boaz was seized, as sole tenant in fee, of 228 acres part of the land demanded, absque hoc that the said Boaz had any thing in the said 228 acres; that Rogers was seized, as sole tenant in fee, of 24

Rand. 110, and Walkers v. Boaz, 2 Rob. 485, only prove the same general doctrine that on the mise joined matter in abatement cannot be taken advantage of by the tenant; but none of these cases touch the question arising in this case which holds that upon the mise joined every affirmative matter going to the right and title of the demandant, the want of which might have been pleaded in bar of the action, is necessarily put in issue and he is put to proof of the same.

Same—Same—Nonsuit.—See generally, monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425.

acres other part thereof, with a like erroneous absque hoc; and that Phelps was seized, as sole tenant in fee, of the balance, with a like absque hoc. The plea was verified by affidavit. At the same time a like plea was tendered in another case of a writ of right by the same demandants against Meshack Boaz and Thomas Coleman. The reason assigned for not offering the pleas sooner was, that Boaz and his counsel did not know how much of his land (he holding one entire tract) was demanded in one suit, and how much in the other, until the last survey was returned. The court, however, rejected the pleas, being of opinion that they were offered at too late a period. And the tenants excepted.

After a demurrer to the count, which the court overruled, the mise was joined on the mere right.

At the trial, the demandants adduced evidence to prove that the land in controversy was granted to Jeremiah Whitney by patent dated June 22, 1780: that Jeremiah Whitney, the patentee, died in the year 1781: that 487 his brother Josiah Whitney was his heir at law, to whom *the said land thereupon descended: that Josiah Whitney sold and conveyed the land, by deed dated March 4, 1783, to Susanna Whitney, who died in 1785: that Susanna Whitney, by her will dated April 7, 1784, devised the land to her son George Christian, but he dying before the testatrix, the devise lapsed, and the land descended to John H. Christian her eldest son and heir at law: that John H. Christian died in 1801, and by his will devised the land to his wife Joice Christian: that Joice Christian died in 1808, intestate, and the land thereupon descended to her daughter and heir at law, Susanna the wife of John M. Walker and mother of the demandants: that Susanna Walker died in 1814, leaving her said husband and five children, namely, the three demandants, and John Walker and an infant child not named: that the infant unnamed child died shortly after his mother, and his fifth part descended to his four brothers, namely, the three demandants and their brother John: and that John died an infant, leaving his three brothers, the demandants, and his father John M. Walker him surviving. And thereupon the court instructed the jury, that upon the death of Susanna Walker, her interest in the land descended to her five children; that on the death of the infant unnamed child, his share (1-5th part) descended to his four brothers, namely, the three demandants and John Walker; that upon the death of John Walker, the share of the land which he derived by descent from his mother (1-5th part) descended to his brothers the three demandants, but the share which he derived by descent from his brother the unnamed infant 1-4th of 1-5th) descended to his father John M. Walker (who was not joined as a demandant in the writ of right), and he thereby became interested as tenant in common with the demandants. Whereupon the demandants, upon an understanding (sanctioned by the court) that the opinion would be reconsidered by the court without prejudice from a nonsuit, if the court should see cause to change its opinion, did suffer a nonsuit. *Afterwards the demandants moved the court to set aside the nonsuit and to reinstate the cause, alleging that the said opinion was contrary to law, and that if otherwise, yet the demandants, notwithstanding the interest of their father aforesaid, might prosecute this action with effect; but the court, not changing its opinion aforesaid, refused to reinstate the cause and set aside the nonsuit; to which opinion the demandants excepted.

On the petition of the demandants, a supersedeas was awarded.

Leigh for plaintiffs in error. Though the opinion of the court below, so far as the same held the father of the demandants entitled to a fourth of a fifth of the land, was correct, the demandants were nevertheless entitled to recover in this action so much of the land as they shewed title to, namely, all except that fourth of a fifth. After the mise has been joined on the mere right, the objection does not lie at the trial, that a party has been omitted who is entitled to part of the land demanded; it does not lie so as to prevent those who are demandants from recovering that to which they are entitled. Green v. Liter and others, 8 Cranch 230; Liter and others v. Green, 2 Wheat. 306; Garrard &c. v. Henry &c., 6 Rand. 110; Linton and others v. Bartly and others, 9 Leigh 444. The nonsuit ought to have been set aside. And for the error in refusing to do so, the judgment should be reversed and a new trial awarded.

The pleas of several tenancy were plainly demurrable, because the traverse (the absque hoc) does not deny the joint seisin of the tenants in the parcel of which sole tenure is pleaded, but denies that the tenant whose sole tenure in such parcel is pleaded, holds any thing in that same parcel. But the chief objection to the pleas, and that which decisively shews that they were properly rejected, is, that they were tendered too late. The matter of the pleas was merely in abatement, and ought to have been pleaded at the appearance day.

489 *Johnson. The only ground upon which the pleas were rejected being that they were offered too late, that is the only question in respect to them which can be considered here. Now the record shews that the pleas were tendered at the first appearance of the tenants. They had not previously appeared in the cause for any purpose, unless such appearance is to be inferred from the entry that the parties came on a certain day, and thereupon the order of survey was made. The meaning of the rule which requires that matter of abatement shall be pleaded at the first appearance of the defendant, is not that he must plead it at the first day on which he might enter an appearance, but only that he shall not, after appearing and pleading other matter, and thereby waiving the matter in abatement, be allowed to go back and avail himself of it. Here it is not pretended that the demandants could have been benefited in any way by an earlier tender of these pleas; and the tender of them was made as soon as the survey enabled the tenants to set forth the particular bounds and description of the parcels which they claimed and held in severalty.

The discretion of the court, to which the motion to set aside the nonsuit was addressed, was properly exercised under the circumstances. At common law, a nonsuit in a writ of right was a bar to a subsequent action for the same lands. But it is no longer so in Virginia since the act of February 11, 1824, Sess. Acts of 1823-4, p. 27, ch. 24, § 2. Here, too, the nonsuit was voluntarily and wantonly suffered: there was, according to the pretensions now advanced for the demandants themselves, no sort of necessity for suffering it. If the opinion pronounced by the court was injurious to them, they might have excepted, and appealed to this court for the correction of the error. •

But suppose the judgment be now reversed, the nonsuit set aside, and the cause sent back for a new trial *on the mise, which is accordingly had, and a verdict and judgment rendered for the demandants: then such judgment might be reversed on a supersedeas by the tenants, because of the rejection of their pleas of several tenancy. Why then set aside the nonsuit and reinstate the cause, when these same pleas, or amended pleas presenting the same matter, must now be received, and the consequence will be the abatement of the suit because of the misjoinder of tenants having no community of interest?

Leigh in reply. The question whether this cause shall be reinstated, or the nonsuit left in force, is of more consequence to the demandants than seems to be supposed on the other side. If put to a new action, they may have to encounter the bar of the statute of limitations. Upon the motion to reinstate, the court below was called on to consider whether the justice of the case required that the motion should be granted; not merely whether the opinion it had expressed on the trial, in consequence of which the nonsuit was submitted to, should be adhered to as correct or changed as erroneous.

That the pleas of several tenancy were offered too late is unquestionable. Garrard &c. v. Henry &c., 6 Rand. 110; 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 128, § 34, p. 496. It is a novel suggestion, that the tenants were obliged to wait for the execution of the order of survey in the cause, before they could plead that the lands which they respectively claimed and held as their own were claimed and held in several rights.

ALLEN, J., delivered the following as the opinion of the court:

It seems to the court, that although the law was correctly propounded by the court below in the instruction given to the jury, yet according to the principles established in Garrard &c. v. Henry &c., 6 Rand. 124, and Linton &c. v. Bartly &c.*, 9 Leigh 444, the objection was matter in abatement, and could not be taken upon the trial of the mise joined on the mere right. And as it appears that the nonsuit was suffered under a misapprehension on the part of the demandants and their counsel as to the legal effect of the instruction upon their right to recover, the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, should, on the motion of the demandants, have set aside the nonsuit, instead of overruling the said motion. It is therefore considered that the judgment be reversed and annulled, and that the plaintiffs in error recover of the defendants in error their costs here expended. And it is further considered that the cause be remanded to the circuit court, with instructions to set aside the nonsuit, and to reinstate the case upon the docket for a trial to be had on the mise joined.

492 *Arrington v. Cheatham & Wife.

November, 1843, Richmond.

(Absent CABELL, P.)

Wills—Payment of Legacy—Personal Liability of Representative—Sureties.—A testator, by his will, after directing that in the first place all his just debts shall be paid, devises and bequeaths to his wife, during her life, his plantation, all his stock and furniture, and six slaves by name; and then, after various specific devises and legacies to his children, directs as follows: "I desire that my wife will, as soon as convenient after my decease, purchase and deliver to my granddaughter C. C. a negro girl of about £50 price, which I give to my said granddaughter and her heirs." The wife is also named executrix. She qualifies as such, giving a bond with sureties; and the whole personal estate, other than specific legacies, is exhausted in payment of the debts. The widow having accepted the property given her by the will, and taken possession of the whole of it, HELD, she is liable personally as legatee, not as executrix for the payment of the legacy to the granddaughter, and the sureties in her executorial bond are no-wise responsible for the same.

Guardian and Ward—Executor Guardian De Facto—Interest on Ward's Legacy *—For several years an infant legatee resides with and is maintained by her grandmother, who is chargeable with the payment of the legacy, the annual interest of which is less than the annual value of the maintenance: HELD, the grandmother shall not be charged with interest on the legacy during the period of such maintenance.

Appellate Court—Decree—Reversal.†—A decree being rendered against the sureties of an executor, and the appellate court being of opinion that they are not liable, decree reversed and bill dismissed.

*See monographic note on "Guardian and Ward" appended to Barnum v. Frost, 17 Gratt. 398.

†Joint Judgments—Reversal.—At common law, a joint judgment erroneous as to some is erroneous as to all of them, although only one had appealed. But though a sum (less than 100 dollars) was erroneously decreed against a succeeding administrator, as to whom the bill ought to have been dismissed, yet he not having appealed, no correction was made by the appellate court in this part of the decree, the appellant being in no wise interested therein.

Joseph Tweedy senior, late of Campbell county, died in the latter part of the year 1810, having duly made and published his last will and testament, whereby, after directing that in the first place all his 493 just debts *should be paid, he devised and bequeathed to his wife Fanny, during her natural life, the tract of land whereon he then lived, all his stock and furniture of every kind, and six slaves by name. He then made various specific devises and bequests to his children (seven in number), including the remainder in the land and slaves given to his wife for life. These devises and bequests to his wife and children comprised his whole estate, real and personal, except one old slave, valued in the appraisement at £20., and some produce and provisions valued at something less than £40. Then followed a clause in these words: "I desire that my wife will, as soon as convenient after my decease, purchase and deliver to my granddaughter Caroline Coleman a negro girl of about £50. price, which I give to my said granddaughter and her heirs." The testator concluded his will by appointing his wife executrix and his two sons Robert and John executors.

The will was proved in Campbell county court on the 9th of December 1810, and Fanny Tweedy the widow and John Tweedy qualified as executors, giving bond with Robert Tweedy (who renounced the executorship), Archer Williamson and Adler Arrington, as their sureties.

Caroline Coleman the granddaughter having, about the year 1819, intermarried with Matthew Cheatham, the said Cheatham and wife, in 1821, filed their bill in the superior court of chancery holden at Lynchburg, against Fanny Tweedy and John Tweedy executors of Joseph Tweedy, and the aforesaid sureties in their executorial bond, setting forth the will of the testator, and praying satisfaction of the legacy thereby given to the female plaintiff.

Fanny Tweedy the executrix answered, that at the time of the testator's death, his estate was very much involved in debt, and not being very productive, it had required 494 all this respondent's exertions to discharge the *debts, which she had at length with much difficulty accomplished. That it had never been convenient for her, since the testator's death, to purchase a slave for the female plaintiff at the price mentioned in the will. That very shortly after the testator's death, the father of the female plaintiff died, leaving her mother and herself, with five other infant, children, in very straitened circumstances; whereupon the respondent took the female plaintiff, then only 6 or 7 years old, to live with her, and thenceforward until her marriage (a period of about ten years) had boarded, clothed and educated her, besides furnishing her, at the time of her marriage, with some articles of personal property. For these supplies, and the maintenance and education of the female plaintiff, the respondent claimed a reasonable compensation, and prayed an account to ascertain the same, and a decree accordingly.

Pending the cause, Fanny Tweedy died, and her estate was committed by the county court of Campbell to Thomas Dixon, sheriff of the said county, for administration. John Tweedy the executor having removed out of the commonwealth, administration de bonis non with the will annexed of Joseph Tweedy the testator was granted to John Roper.

An amended bill was afterwards filed by the plaintiffs, making defendants the said administrator of Fanny Tweedy, the said administrator de bonis non of Joseph Tweedy the testator, all the children of the testator (devisees and legatees in his will). John Tweedy as executor, and the sureties aforesaid in the executorial bond; praying a decree for the legacy of £50. with interest from a reasonable time after the testator's death, or for a slave such as the will described, with reasonable hires from the time when she ought to have been purchased according to the true intent of the said will.

Roper the administrator de bonis non of Joseph Tweedy the testator, Elizabeth Coleman one of the legatees, Robert 495 *Tweedy another legatee, who was also a surety in the bond given by the executors, and Adler Arrington another surety in the said bond, severally put in answers, submitting to the court the question whether, upon a just construction of the will, the legacy to the plaintiff Caroline was chargeable upon the testator's estate generally, or only upon the portion thereof devised and bequeathed to the widow. Roper in his answer also stated, that the widow took possession of all the property, real and personal, given her by the will, and remained so possessed until her death. The estate, he said, which had come to his hands as administrator de bonis non, amounted only to 45 or 50 dollars in value.

The other defendants, though regularly proceeded against, failed to answer.

In the progress of the cause, accounts were directed, 1. of the administration of Joseph Tweedy's estate by Fanny Tweedy and John Tweedy his executors; 2. of the administration of the same estate by John and must be reversed as to all. Vance Shoe Co. v. Haught, 41 W. Va. 282, 23 S. E. Rep. 556, citing the principal case; Jones v. Raine, 4 Rand. 386; Vandiver v. Roberts, 4 W. Va. 498; Lyman v. Thompson, 11 W. Va. 427; Lenows v. Lenow, 8 Gratt. 349; Purcell v. McCleary, 10 Gratt. 246; Gray v. Stuart, 33 Gratt. 358.

See monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425.

Roper the administrator de bonis non; and 3. of the annual value of the life estate of Fanny Tweedy under the will of the said testator. These accounts were taken accordingly. By the first it appeared, that the executors of Joseph Tweedy had paid all the debts due from the estate, amounting to £346. 11. and delivered all the specific legacies given by the will: that, exclusive of specific legacies, the assets which came to their hands to be administered (including hires, during the years 1812, 1813, 1814 and 1815, of three of the slaves bequeathed to the widow for life) amounted only to £347. 11.: and that, allowing a commission of five per cent. to the executors, there was a balance due to them from the estate, on the 27th of March 1817, of £43. 18. Secondly, the account of Roper's administration on the estate of Joseph Tweedy shewed a balance due from him to the estate, on the 15th of February 1834, of 9 dollars 49 cents. Thirdly, it appeared that the annual value of the property devised and bequeathed to Fanny Tweedy for life by the will of Joseph Tweedy, was about 170 dollars.

By depositions taken and filed in the cause, it appeared that Caroline Coleman resided at least eight years with her grandmother Mrs. Tweedy, who sent her to school for two or three years of that period. In the opinion of the witnesses, the schooling was worth 25 dollars, and the board worth 160 dollars, or 20 dollars per annum. It further appeared, that when Caroline was married, Mrs. Tweedy supplied her with several articles of furniture and a small stock of hogs, estimated to be worth 86 dollars.

The cause having been regularly transferred to the circuit superior court of Campbell county, came on to be heard in that court on the 1st of October 1834; when the court, expressing the opinion that the legacy of £50. to the female plaintiff should have been paid out of the profits of the life estate of Fanny Tweedy, the widow and one of the personal representatives of Joseph Tweedy deceased, and that she as executrix and her sureties were bound to pay the same, decreed that John Roper, administrator as aforesaid, pay the plaintiffs 9 dollars 49 cents, the amount appearing by the commissioner's report to be in his hands, with interest from the 15th of February 1834; and that the same John Roper, administrator as aforesaid, out of the estate in his hands if any he had to be administered, and Robert Tweedy, Archer Williamson and Adler Arrington, the sureties of Fanny Tweedy in her executorial bond, pay the plaintiffs £50. or 166 dollars 66 cents, with interest from the 31st of December 1811 until paid (subject to a credit of 9 dollars 49 cents, above decreed against the said John Roper administrator as aforesaid), and the costs of this suit: the court being of opinion that the other executor John Tweedy was in no wise bound for the debt, interest and costs aforesaid.

497 *On the petition of Adler Arrington, one of the sureties, an appeal was allowed him from the decree.

The cause was argued by C. and G. N. Johnson for the appellant, and by Garland and Grattan for the appellees, upon the following objections taken by the appellant's counsel to the decree:

1. That Mrs. Tweedy was required to pay the legacy of £50. not as executrix, but as legatee, and her sureties were in no manner responsible for it.

2. That if the executors were chargeable with the payment of this legacy, it was a joint charge upon them both, for which both were bound in exoneration of their sureties.

3. That an account of Mrs. Tweedy's estate ought to have been taken.

4. That credit should have been allowed Mrs. Tweedy for the board, clothing and education of the plaintiff Caroline, and for the advancement made to her upon her marriage.

STANARD, J. If the testamentary provision for the appellee Caroline, contained in the will of Joseph Tweedy, were a pecuniary legacy for which the legatee might assert a claim on his executors, and they in their executorial characters might be held responsible after the surrender of the legacy to the widow, on whom the provision for the said Caroline is charged, no recovery could be had on such claim, because it clearly appears that the personal estate of the testator, exclusive of debts and specific legacies, supplied no fund to pay it. If it be but a mere charge on the legatee, the widow, on whom the duty of making the provision is imposed by the will (and such, I think, is its true character), that legatee, by the acceptance of the legacy, which by just intendment is to be regarded as the consideration for the duty, incurred a responsibility to make the provision, 498 *which charged her personally as legatee, and not executorially in respect to assets for which, as executrix, she might be liable. The title of the female appellee to the provision became complete, when the legatee, on whom the duty of making it was imposed, got the legacy in consideration of which it was imposed. The title to the provision was consummate at the moment that the subject on which it might be charged became vested in the legatee as such; and at the same time all executorial responsibility therefor terminated, and the personal responsibility of the legatee alone remained.

In either, or any just view of the case, the sureties for the performance of the executorial bond were not responsible for the failure to make the provision, of the legatee on whom the duty of making it was imposed, and who had received as legatee the subject bequeathed to her, in consideration of which she was required by the will to fulfil that duty. After Mrs. Tweedy had received the legacy bequeathed to her, she alone was responsible to the female appellee.

Mrs. Tweedy being alone responsible to the female appellee, the decree ought to have been against her representative only, and the bill ought to have been dismissed as to the other parties. But the representative of Joseph Tweedy, against whom a decree for the small sum of 9 dollars 49 cents was rendered, not having appealed, and the appellant being in no wise interested in that part of the decree, I think that part of it is not before this court for correction.

As the female appellee was supplied with board &c. by Mrs. Tweedy until her marriage in 1819, the representative of Mrs. Tweedy ought not to be held responsible for interest on the £50. during that time.

PER CURIAM. This court is of opinion that the decree, so far as the appellant is directly or indirectly interested therein, that is, so much thereof as subjects 499 the *sureties in the executorial bond to responsibility, be reversed and annulled, and that the appellees pay to the appellant the costs expended in the prosecution of his appeal. And this court proceeding to render such decree as the court below ought to have rendered, instead of that hereby reversed, doth adjudge, order and decree that Thomas Dixon sheriff of Campbell, to whom was committed the estate of Fanny Tweedy, out of the assets of his intestate in his hands to be administered, if so much thereof he hath, pay to the appellees the sum of 166 dollars 66 cents with interest thereon from the 1st of January 1819 till paid (subject to a credit of 9 dollars 49 cents as of the 15th of February 1834), and their costs expended in the prosecution of their suit in the superior court; that the bill of the appellees, as to the defendants Robert Tweedy, Archer Williamson and Adler Arrington, be dismissed; and that the appellees pay to those defendants the costs by them in their defence in the superior court expended.

Appellate Jurisdiction—Injunction—Motion to Dissolve—Overruled.*—An appeal lies to the court of appeals from an order of a circuit court overruling a motion to dissolve an injunction which was improvidently granted. Accord. Lomax v. Picot, 2 Rand. 247.

Mills and Milldams—When Owner Cannot Be Injoined from Rebuilding Dam†—Case at Bar.—Two verdicts were rendered in favour of a party whose land was overflowed, against the owner of a mill for keeping his dam too high. The dam was then swept away: and the plaintiff at law thereafter exhibited a bill of injunction against the mill owner, which alleged that he had not begun, within the time prescribed by law, to rebuild the dam, also contained a suggestion in general terms, that irreparable mischief would result to the plaintiff from rebuilding the same. It did not appear that there was ever any order of court granting leave to build the mill and dam; it did appear, however, that the mill and dam had existed more than 50 years. Held, that the verdicts for keeping the dam too high shew that the mill owner had at least a prescriptive right to keep the dam at some height; that these verdicts did not warrant an injunction to restrain him from rebuilding the dam, in the absence of any allegation in the bill that he was about to build it, or had threatened to build it, beyond the authorized height; and that if it was competent for a court of equity to interpose at all to enforce a forfeiture of the mill owner's right because of his failure to rebuild the dam within the time prescribed by law, it ought not to be done by way of injunction, without an allegation in the bill of some distinct and sufficient ground of irreparable mischief.

In August 1836, Joseph Tyree exhibited a bill to the judge of the circuit court of Hanover, setting forth, that he is the owner of a tract of land in Hanover county on the south side of Mattadyquin creek, and Dyd-ball Talley is the owner of a tract on the north side of said creek; that across the creek, for many years, Talley had had a dam, and a mill connected therewith; that whether the same was authorized by law or not, the complainant had never been able clearly to ascertain, but so far as 501 *he had investigated the subject, he was satisfied, and therefore charged, that legal and proper permission had never been obtained to erect said dam and mill; that it is certain, however, the same has been, within less than 20 years, raised above any height at which in previous years it had stood, and by consequence had greatly flooded and injured the complainant's land; that for this injury the complainant instituted an action at law, and by a fair trial obtained a verdict and judgment; that the said Talley still continuing to hold the water in his pond higher than he should under any circumstances have done, the complainant, for this continued injury, instituted another suit at law against the said Talley, and obtained another verdict and judgment; that sometime about the 10th of September 1834, a considerable part of the dam of the said mill was swept off by a very heavy flood, by which all the water, or very nearly all, was drawn off from the pond, and the lands above the dam were uncovered, and have since so remained; that the said Talley had not since begun to "rebuild or repair" the said mill, although the same had been unfit for public use nearly two years; but that he now threatened to rebuild the dam forthwith, and by doing so he would again flood and greatly injure the land of the complainant, lying both above and below the said dam. And the complainant alleged, that if the said Talley should be permitted to proceed thus arbitrarily and illegally, he (the complainant) would be subjected to the most serious and irreparable injury; an injury for which he could obtain no adequate legal relief. An injunction was therefore prayed, to restrain the said Talley from proceeding to rebuild or repair the said mill or dam.

†Mills and Milldams.—See monographic note on "Mills and Milldams" appended to Calhoun v. Palmer, 8 Gratt. 88

The injunction was awarded.

Talley answered, that the mill and dam (or rather the privilege thereof) have existed in use and unquestioned, certainly for 50 years, and he believed for a 502 *much longer time. He admitted that he had not found, among the records of Hanover county court, the original proceedings by which his said mill was established; but it was, he said, one of the oldest in the country, and could be proved to have had existence at a period the records of which were very imperfect, and it was not improbable that it was built at a time when it was lawful, and frequently the practice, to build mills and dams without application to any court for authority to do so. The complainant's speaking of the water having been, within less than twenty years, raised above its proper height, betrayed, the respondent argued, the complainant's own knowledge of the fact which he pretended to question, that the said mill and dam had an undoubted legal existence, from the length of time they had continued. The respondent did not deny that the complainant had recovered two verdicts against him in actions brought to recover damages for injury done to his lands. In these suits, he said, he laboured under the disadvantage of having no record to shew the height to which he was entitled to hold the water in his pond, and he believed that in consequence of this the jurors referred to his supposed illegal acts, consequences resulting from the relative situation of the creek and of the complainant's land. For, he said, he believed he could shew that as much injury would result to the land from a flood in the creek, when his dam is down and the water let off, as when the dam is standing. After each verdict, he said, he held the water in his pond at a lower height. Yet the complainant had instituted a third suit to recover damages for injury to his land in the intervening period between the last verdict and the month of September 1834, when the dam was carried away; and had avowed his purpose to contest the respondent's right to have his mill and dam on the site where they had stood so long, on any terms whatever. The only ground, 503 the respondent argued, upon *which the complainant could come into equity, was for the prevention of irreparable injury. What, he asked, is the "irreparable injury" in the present case? The plaintiff complains that his land will be covered when the dam is raised too high. Then, said the respondent, the injury can only arise from raising the dam to an illegal height. "How can the complainant anticipate that this will be done, and that injury will ensue? Will it not be time enough to bring his action when the injury actually occurs? And has he shewn in any manner that such action will not compensate the injury?" The respondent denied emphatically the allegation in the bill that he did not begin to rebuild and repair his dam within one year from the 7th of September 1834, when it was carried away; and proceeded to state what he had done towards such rebuilding and repair, and when he did it.

Depositions read in the actions at law were produced by the defendant to shew the antiquity of the mill. According to these depositions, it was erected before 1768.

The defendant moved to dissolve the injunction, but the court overruled the motion.

From this order an appeal was allowed.

Daniel for appellant. The appeal was properly allowed in this case, to settle the principles of the cause, and save expense and delay. 1 R. C. 1819, ch. 66, § 57, p. 208; Sess. Acts 1830-31, ch. 11, § 31; Suppl. to Rev. Code, p. 149. The case of Lomax v. Picot, 2 Rand. 247, is a decision in point.

The charge of irreparable injury to the appellee from the erection of the dam is in general terms, and it is not shewn how such injury is to result. The jurisdiction of equity to interfere in such cases by injunction is of modern origin, and 504 very cautiously exercised. *Coulson v. White, 3 Atk. 21; Hanson v. Gardiner, 7 Ves. 307; Stevens v. Beekman and others, 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 318; 2 Story's Eq. 207, § 928; Earl of Ripon and others v. Hobart and others, 3 Mylne & Keene 169; 8 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 331. The principle of this last case is directly applicable to the present. In Crenshaws v. The Slate River Company, 6 Rand. 245, the court adverts to the peculiar nature and public utility of mill property, and the hardship which may be inflicted on the mill owner by the interference of the court of chancery.

Lyons for appellee. It may well be questioned whether an appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an injunction is sustainable. Great delay, without any corresponding benefit, must be the consequence of allowing appeals in such cases, since they are not now privileged in respect to the time of the hearing.

This is a case of nuisance, in which there have been repeated trials at law, and repeated verdicts for the plaintiff. In such a case, equity has unquestionable jurisdiction to interfere by injunction, as it would have, indeed, if the case were one of simple trespass. Eden on Injunctions 259-275; 1 Chitty's Gen. Pract. 722, 4; Field v. Beaumont, 1 Swanst. 208; Gardner v. Village of Newburgh, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 164; Corning and others v. Lowerre, 6 Id. 439; Beveridge v. Lacey, 3 Rand. 63. The plaintiff had no adequate remedy but in equity. If he had waited until the dam was rebuilt, a prosecution for a public nuisance could not be sustained. Webb v. The Commonwealth, 2 Leigh 721. And the plaintiff might also have been held to have waived his right to equitable relief, by his delay in applying to the court. As to actions at law, the history of this case is enough to shew that they would not afford any sufficient or effectual redress.

505 *Daniel in reply. While the act of April 16, 1831, (Sess. Acts 1830-31, ch. 11, § 32; Suppl. to Rev. Code p. 149,) has taken away the right to priority of hearing in cases such as this, it has left the right of appeal as it was under the former law.

The defendant had an unquestionable right to have his dam at some height, and it does not follow, because it has been heretofore too high, that he intended to rebuild it to an illegal height. [Lyons. The verdicts ascertain that the former height of the dam was illegal: but they do not determine that the defendant had a right to raise the dam. He may have had no right at all to have a dam at the place.] The verdicts are not in the record. They were not found, however, because a dam was unlawfully in existence, but because the height of it was too great. The bill itself concedes that the defendant had a right to have a dam of some height. And the plaintiff does not shew that the rebuilding the same would produce injury to him. There is then no ground disclosed by the bill for equitable interference; and though a demurrer might have been filed for that cause, yet it was unnecessary. The want of equity in the bill is a proper consideration on a motion to dissolve the injunction.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the following as the opinion of the court:

The court is of opinion, that the verdicts recovered by the appellee against the appellant for keeping his dam, in the proceedings mentioned, too high, serve to shew that he had at least a prescriptive right to keep the same at some height; and therefore that if it was competent for a court of equity to interpose at all, to enforce the alleged forfeiture of such right, by reason of the appellant's alleged failure to reconstruct his dam (after it had been swept away) within the time prescribed by law, it ought not to have been done by 506 *way of injunction, without an allegation in the bill of some distinct and sufficient ground of irreparable mischief, instead of a general and indefinite suggestion of such mischief. And the court is further of opinion, that the said verdicts against the appellant for keeping his dam beyond the authorized height did not warrant an injunction to restrain him from reconstructing it at all, or even from reconstructing it beyond the authorized height, in the absence of any allegation in the bill that he was about to reconstruct, or had threatened to reconstruct it, beyond such authorized height. The court is therefore of opinion, that the circuit court erred in refusing to dissolve the injunction which had been granted to the appellee, inasmuch as the same was improvidently granted. It is therefore considered that the order of the said circuit court overruling the appellant's motion to dissolve said injunction be reversed and annulled, and that the appellant recover against the appellee his costs by him expended in the prosecution of his appeal here. And this court proceeding to make such order as the said circuit court ought to have made, it is further considered that the said injunction be dissolved. Which is ordered to be certified to the said circuit court.

+Dower—Laid Off by Metes and Bounds.—In Tracey v. Shumate, 22 W. Dismal Swamp Co., 2 Rob. 507, in which the court held, that when a husband makes a deed of trust conveying land to a trustee to secure debts, and the husband remains in possession till his death, no sale by the trustee being made in his lifetime, the husband is to be considered as having died seized of the land subject to the deed of trust, so that the widow, if she did not join in the deed of trust, is entitled to dower in like manner, as if the deed had not been made; and therefore of course she has a right to have her dower assigned her in kind and by metes and bounds." deed until after his death, the husband is to be considered as having died seized of the land subject to the deed of trust, so that his widow, if she did not join in the deed, and is entitled to dower in the land, may recover rents and profits from the husband's death in like manner as if the deed had not been made. In case the widow die before recovering such rents and profits, the same may be recovered to the period of her death by her administrator.

Same—Woodland Incapable of Cultivation.—A husband dies seized of land incapable of cultivation, and no otherwise productive or valuable than by working the timber and making sale thereof when converted into shingles. It appears that previous to as well as after the husband's death, the timber was worked, and large profits derived from the sale of shingles. Parties coming into possession after the husband's death, under a deed of trust made by him in his lifetime, admit his widow's right as dowress to one third of the timber worked, and for several years pay her one third of the proceeds of the same. Payment is afterwards stopped. HOLD, those in possession of the land after the husband's death shall account to the widow or her administrator for one third of the profits received by them during her life, subject to credit for the payments made by them to the widow.

Same—Laches—Account of Profits.—Under a deed of trust of land made by a husband, the trustees after his death sell the land, and the purchaser conveys it away to others. A bill is afterwards filed by the widow against the trustees, the purchaser's executor, and those in possession, claiming dower in the land, and an account of profits; pending which suit the widow dies. The bill upon its face shews a delay, without excuse, of more than 20 years in calling the trustees and the purchaser's executor to an account. The surviving trustee swears *positively that he has paid over to the widow every dollar for which he and his cotrustee were accountable, and exhibits vouchers in proof of his allegation. The widow, by her own shewing in the bill, prosecuted to recovery a suit against the executor of the purchaser, for her share of the profits received by him; and the only pretext for a further demand, and that without a shadow of proof, is that she did not recover enough. HOLD, the plaintiff is entitled to no account as regards the trustees and the purchaser's executor, and the bill was properly dismissed as to them.

By two patents bearing date the 29th of November 1796, the commonwealth granted unto Alexander Macaulay and Isaac Sexton and their heirs, jointly, two parcels of land lying in Norfolk county, one of them containing 300 acres, the other containing 7700 acres. These two parcels of land, which adjoined each other, constituting an entire tract of 8000 acres, were situate within the bounds of the Dismal swamp. By a deed dated the 15th of November 1797, Alexander Macaulay conveyed to Thomas Griffin and Thomas Nelson (among other property) one moiety of the said tract of 8000 acres, upon trust to sell the same as soon as they conveniently could, and out of the proceeds pay to certain creditors of Macaulay designated in the deed, in the order therein specified, the amount of the debts due them respectively, and pay the residue of such proceeds, if any, to the use of any other creditors of Macaulay. Elizabeth Macaulay, the wife of Alexander Macaulay, did not unite with him in this conveyance. The grantor died in July 1798.

In November 1829, Elizabeth Macaulay filed a bill in the superior court of chancery for the Williamsburg district, setting forth, that her husband the said Alexander Macaulay died seized in fee simple of an undivided moiety of the said tract of 8000 acres, and that she now holds the right of dower in the same. That previous to and since the death of Alexander Macaulay, the timber on the said land, for which the same was principally *if not solely valuable, was worked, and large profits derived from the sale of shingles &c. That after the death of Alexander Macaulay, the trustees in the deed aforesaid, or Thomas Griffin the survivor of them, took possession of the land, and for many years caused the same to be worked, receiving during the time large sums from the proceeds thereof. That at a subsequent period John Jameson became possessed of the said land, and for many years worked the same, and received large sums from the proceeds thereof. That the Dismal Swamp land company thereafter got possession of the said land, and for more than twenty years past have worked the same, and received considerable sums from the proceeds thereof. That during the time the land was held and worked by the said trustees, the complainant received a portion of the proceeds in right of her dower; and that about the year 1817, she recovered by suit against the executor of Jameson the third part of 2000 dollars, with interest, as her portion of the proceeds for the year 1803, one of the years during which the land was held and worked by the said Jameson. That since the land has been in the possession of the Dismal Swamp land company, the complainant has at two different times received portions of the proceeds in part of her dower. That for these two payments, which were the only payments made to her by the said company on account of her dower right, indemnifying bonds with sureties were required and given, one of them bearing date the 9th of November 1816, the other the 10th of July 1817, both of which were expressed in similar terms. (A copy of the first bond, the original whereof was afterwards filed with the answer of the company, was exhibited with the bill.) That from Griffin as surviving trustee, from the estate of Jameson, and from the Dismal Swamp land company, (which said parties have each, by their partial payments to the complainant, fully admitted her right to a third part of all *the net proceeds of the said land) there are still considerable sums due and unpaid to her in right of her dower. That at the time of her said recovery from Jameson's executor on account of the year 1803, she was advised that Jameson's estate was only responsible to her for the third of the proceeds of that particular year; but she is now otherwise advised. That the last of the payments made to her by the Dismal Swamp land company was made on the 10th of July 1817; since which time the said company, although they have repeatedly admitted her right to a third of the proceeds of the said land, and have been often called upon and pressed to pay the amount still due to her, have failed and yet refuse to pay the same. Griffin the surviving trustee, John M'Neale executor of Jameson, and the president and managers of the Dismal Swamp land company, were made defendants, and the prayer of the bill was, that accounts might be taken of the proceeds of the land for the time that the same was held by the said trustees, by Jameson, and by the land company, respectively, and for general relief.

The president and managers of the Dismal Swamp land company answered, that they had no knowledge of so much of the plaintiff's case as respected the other defendants, and they considered that the same ought not to be blended with the demand against these respondents. That, upon the plaintiff's own shewing, it could not be true that her husband died seized of an undivided moiety of the land in question, his seisin having been defeated by his conveyance to the trustees Griffin and Nelson. That these respondents, in the year ———, became the purchasers of an undivided moiety of the said land at the price of 4000 dollars. That the land was not arable, but swamp land; its chief value consisted of the juniper timber thereon, and the profits arose from felling the timber and working it up into shingles.

511 That on the 9th of November *1816, these respondents paid the plaintiff 985 dollars 83 cents, taking from her a refunding bond (which they exhibited). That on the 9th of July 1817, they paid her another sum of 460 dollars. That in 1818, as appears from the records of the company, an order was made to pay her the further sum of 183 dollars 33 cents; and on the 15th of November 1825, upon her statement that she had never received the last mentioned sum, an order was made by the company for its payment, and it was paid accordingly. The respondents charged, that the sums thus paid were not due to the complainant, but far exceeded her just claim as tenant in dower, if she had any such claim at all. The payments were made on an assumption that, as widow, she was entitled to one third of the net proceeds received from the land. But that assumption was manifestly erroneous; for, as tenant for life, she was not entitled to the timber, by the felling and sale of which alone the profits arose, but the same belonged to the respondents; and even if she had a title to share in the profits accruing from the timber, it was certainly not that of a proprietor in fee of one third, but only to an equivalent for her life estate therein, which could not be more than one ninth part, or at the utmost one seventh. The respondents therefore now claimed, on an adjustment of the accounts, to recover back with interest so much of the sums paid the complainant as exceeded her due proportion. It would be seen, they said, "that by this erroneous mode of adjustment the complainant received in these payments 1629 dollars 16 cents, considerably more than one third of the fee simple cost, 4000 dollars, although it be true, and is so admitted by the bill, that the land was no otherwise productive or valuable than by working the timber, and making sale thereof when converted into shingles." The respondents further stated, that in the year 1820 they had disclaimed all 512 future operations upon the *former plan, and informed the complainant that she might have her dower assigned and laid off in the land; which, however, she had never done.

The refunding bond, exhibited with the answer, was executed by Elizabeth Macaulay and two sureties. By the condition,—after reciting that the said Elizabeth, as the widow of Alexander Macaulay, was entitled in right of her dower to one third part of the proceeds of timber from a moiety of 8000 acres of land in the Dismal swamp, of which said moiety the said Alexander Macaulay died seized, and of which the Dismal Swamp land company was now possessed; that the said company had that day paid her, in part of her dower thirds of the said proceeds, the sum of 985 dollars 83 cents; and that a suit was then pending in the federal court for the district of Virginia, in the name of J. Mordecai and others, against the devisee of Isaac Sexton and others, in which the plaintiffs claimed title to the said tract of land,—it was provided, that if the said suit should be determined in favour of the plaintiffs, and the said company should be compelled by law to refund the amount of proceeds received by them on account of the sales of timber from the said land, Elizabeth Macaulay should in that case repay them the said 985 dollars 83 cents, with interest.

Griffin the surviving trustee answered, that by an agreement between Alexander Macaulay and the creditors specified in the trust deed, Macaulay was permitted to retain possession of the trust property until his death, which happened in July 1798. That from his death until December 1801, when the Dismal Swamp land was sold under the trust deed, the trustees received the profits of the same, amounting in the whole to 4020 dollars, of which they paid to Mrs. Macaulay, in right of her dower, one third part or 1340 dollars, as would appear by her two receipts, (which were 513 exhibited with the answer, one of them bearing date the *27th of February, the other the 25th of November, 1801). That at the sale, in December 1801, of Macaulay's undivided moiety of the land, John Jameson, one of the creditors named in the deed, became the purchaser thereof; since which period, nothing had ever been received by the trustees, or either of them, as profits of the said land, and they had never interfered with the same. And the respondent positively asserted that there was not one cent now due and unpaid to the complainant by the trustees, as the whole of her dower money was regularly paid to her by them as long as they received any dividends.

To the answers of the Dismal Swamp land company and Griffin, the plaintiff replied generally.

In February 1830, Elizabeth Macaulay the plaintiff died; and in July following, the suit was revived in the name of Robert Anderson her executor.

The cause having been transferred to the circuit superior court of law and chancery for James City county and the city of Williamsburg, Anderson the executor filed an amended bill in that court, in July 1833, setting forth, that the intermarriage of Alexander and Elizabeth Macaulay took place in 1781: that during the coverture the said Alexander was seized of an estate of inheritance in an undivided moiety of the aforesaid tract of 8000 acres: that Isaac Sexton died before the said Alexander, and by his will devised his undivided moiety of the said land to his son Edwin Sexton, who held the same for many years: that Edwin Sexton having, in February 1823, taken the oath of an insolvent debtor, and surrendered his interest in the said land, the said interest was thereupon sold, and Richard H. Drummond and Harrison Allmand became the purchasers thereof, that is to say, the former became the purchaser of three fifths, and the latter of the remaining two fifths: that Allmand subsequently sold and conveyed his undivided two fifths to Joseph 514 T. Allyn: that the said Edwin Sexton, *Drummond, Allmand and Allyn had respectively derived large profits from the said land, by cutting the timber, getting out shingles, &c.: and that the said Elizabeth Macaulay never did receive the full amount of her dower interest in the said land, although repeated demands were made therefor before her death. The prayer was, that the defendants to the original bill might be made defendants to this amended bill, and required to answer the same; that the administratrix of Nelson the deceased trustee, the administrator of Edwin Sexton deceased, and Drummond, Allmand and Allyn, might be made defendants to both bills, and required to answer the same; that accounts might be taken of all the proceeds and profits derived from the land by the said Edwin Sexton, Drummond, Allmand and Allyn, respectively, and by the trustees Griffin and Nelson jointly, or the said Nelson separately; and that the complainant might have a decree for one full third of the net profits of an undivided moiety of said 8000 acres of land, as the interest to which his testatrix was entitled, and general relief.

Griffin the surviving trustee put in an answer to the amended bill, in substance the same with his answer to the original bill.

M'Neale the executor of Jameson put in an answer to both the bills, in which (not admitting but wholly denying the matters charged against him) he alleged and insisted, that when the said bills were respectively exhibited, he was, as he had ever since been, a resident of Culpeper county, without the jurisdiction as well of the superior court of chancery of Williamsburg, as of the circuit superior court of James City: that the matters charged in the said bills against this respondent and against the other defendants are wholly distinct and separate in interest, and not of common and joint interest between this respondent and the other defendants, so as to give and draw to the said courts jurisdiction over this respondent, together with the other defendants, as 515 *to the matters alleged in the said bills: and therefore that the said courts had no right, power or authority to entertain jurisdiction of the cause against this respondent. He also relied upon the lapse of time, and the act for the limitation of actions and suits, in bar of the demand asserted against him by the said bills.

To the foregoing answers of Griffin and Jameson's executor, the plaintiff replied generally.

Nelson's administratrix, Edwin Sexton's administrator, Drummond, Allmand and Allyn failed to answer, and the bills were taken for confessed as to them.

The cause coming on to be heard the 30th of October 1835, the circuit court decreed that the bills be dismissed with costs.

From that decree Anderson the executor of Elizabeth Macaulay appealed to this court.

Daniel for appellant. This case is distinguishable from Tod v. Baylor, 4 Leigh 498, and Thomas v. Gammel & wife, 6 Leigh 9, upon the supposed authority of which the circuit court seems to have proceeded in dismissing the bill. Those were cases of absolute alienation by the husband of all right legal and equitable. Here there was merely a trust deed, a charge for the payment of debts, executed after the marriage and after the wife's title to dower had accrued: and the husband died seized of the equity of redemption. Mortgages are considered, both at law and in equity, as mere chattel interests, mere securities for money, the mortgagee acquiring a new estate by entry upon the breach of the condition. 1 Powell on Mortgages (Boston ed. of 1828) p. 112, note E, Runyan v. Mersereau, 11 Johns. R. 534; Doe v. Pott, Dougl. 720, 21. Where a wife joins her husband in a mortgage, but not in a subsequent release, she is entitled to dower in the equity of redemption, and to an account of rents and profits *from his death. Swaine v. Perine, 5 Johns. Ch. R. 482; Hale v. James, 6 Johns. Ch. R. 258. Again, though where the right is merely equitable, equity follows the law, yet where the court exercises its own peculiar jurisdiction (as where the widow comes into equity to get a term out of her way), the relief is larger: profits will be given from the time the title accrued. Dormer v. Fortescue, 3 Atk. 130, 31. In Curtis v. Curtis, 2 Bro. C. C. 620, profits were decreed to the representative of the widow from the time of the husband's death, and against the representative of the heir, though it was admitted that damages would not have been recoverable at law. The statute giving dower in trust estates has innovated largely on the technical principle of seisin on the husband, and shews the spirit of our legislature on the subject.

II. Where dower is demanded against the alienee of the husband and refused, damages are given from the time of such refusal. Park on Dower p. 302. Here the widow's right has been acknowledged by all who have held the estate since her husband's death. They were receivers or bailiffs, liable to account, and actually accounting.

III. It nowhere appears that those persons had any other title than possession. Their title is merely affirmed in the answers, but not proved.

IV. The widow is entitled to one third of the profits of the timber cut from the land. The only mode in which the estate could be enjoyed was by making a profit of the timber. In Crouch v. Puryear &c., 1 Rand. 258, it was held that a dowress may take coal to any extent from a mine already opened, or sink new shafts in the same vein of coal, or penetrate through a seam already opened and take coal from a new seam that lies underneath. The principle of that case is directly applicable to this.

517 *Cooke and Patton for appellee Griffin. The court below was right in dismissing this bill as against Griffin, I. Because the suit was brought against him nearly 27 years after his alleged receivership had terminated. If this be in substance a suit for money had and received, the court of equity, which proceeds by analogy to the limitation at law, will hold it barred by the lapse of five years. Hovenden v. Lord Annesley, 2 Sch. & Lef. 631. And whether the statute applies or not, the claim is at all events objectionable as stale. Carr's adm'r &c. v. Chapman's legatees, 5 Leigh 164, and authorities there cited. It is true that neither the lapse of time nor the statute of limitations is relied upon in Griffin's answer. But where a bill asserts a claim which on its face appears to be stale, and such that equity on its known principles will not entertain it, the bill is demurrable unless it assigns a sufficient reason for the delay to sue. Story's Eq. Pl. 389, § 503. And though the defendant answer without relying upon that objection, the court may nevertheless dismiss the bill upon that ground. Story's Eq. Pl. 352, § 447.

II. Because the bill is multifarious;

Story's Eq. Pl. 407, § 530. This is a fatal defect, and the defence need not be set up in the pleadings in any way. Id. p. 224, § 271.

III. Because the plaintiff, by a suit commenced in November 1829, seeks to recover of Griffin profits received by him from 1798 to 1802; whereas by the case of Tod v. Baylor, 4 Leigh 498, it is settled that a widow cannot recover of her husband's alienee any profits except from the time when her subpoena was sued out.

IV. Because the bill having called upon Griffin to render a full and true account of all the profits which had been received by himself and his cotrustee, he did render a full account upon oath. Such account is prima facie evidence. Cavendish v. Fleming, 3 Munf. 198. It is neither falsified, nor does the amended bill, filed after Griffin's answer, call in question any of its statements. Upon the account so rendered it appears that the plaintiff had no just claim whatever against Griffin.

Harrison for M'Neale executor of Jameson. The plaintiff here has brought, in the court of chancery, a joint action of trespass for several trespasses alleged to have been committed at several times by several tortfeasors. There is no connexion in interest shewn between the defendants. Jameson's executor pleads the misjoinder, pleads to the jurisdiction of the court as to him, and also relies upon the lapse of time and the statute of limitations. Upon all these grounds the bill was properly dismissed as to him. His answer further denies and puts in issue all the allegations of the bill against him, and there is no proof to sustain them.

Stanard for the Dismal Swamp land company. At common law, in no real action, possessory or droiturel, were damages given against the tenant for the mesne profits of the land recovered. When therefore dower was detained against the widow, and she was obliged to bring a writ of dower, she was by the common law entitled to the profits of her third part of the lands from the time only when she recovered judgment; for the tenant was permitted to retain the profits of the estate intermediate the recovery against him in possessory actions, and his entry into possession, to enable him to perform the feudal services. 1 Roper on Husband and Wife p. 437. This was changed by the statute of Merton, which we have enacted in terms, 1 R. C. of 1819, p. 403, ch. 107, § 4. But by that statute a widow "shall recover damages only when her husband dies seized, that is, seized of the freehold and inheritance." Co. Litt. 32 b. And the case of Bromley v. Littleton, Yelv. 112, decides, that a mere finding that the husband died 519 *seized (not expressing that he died seized of the freehold and inheritance) is insufficient to entitle the widow to judgment for dower. Here the husband at the time of his death had no seisin of the freehold or inheritance in the land in question; no title, in fact, legal or equitablé, but only (at most) a bare possession. The legal title was in the trustees to whom he had conveyed the land; the equitable title in the cestuis que trust, the creditors provided for by the deed. Macaulay himself had nothing but a resulting trust in the surplus proceeds of the land after satisfying the objects of the conveyance. There is no sufficient evidence, as against the Dismal Swamp land company, that he was even in possession of the land at the time of his death. The statement of the trustee Griffin on that subject is no evidence against his codefendants.

Our statute making widows dowable of their husband's trust estates can have no influence on the case. The bill does not claim dower in the equity of redemption or resulting trust (if any such there were) of the husband, but asserts generally a right to dower in the land.

II. The case of Tod v. Baylor, 4 Leigh 498, does not decide that the widow there was entitled against the husband's alienee to rents and profits from the time of instituting her suit. Three of the judges concurred in the opinion that she was entitled to rents and profits only from the date of the decree. And as the decree does not give profits from the institution of the suit, although it directs the account to be taken from that period, it is not inconsistent with the opinion of those judges. This construction of that case is confirmed by the subsequent case of Thomas v. Gammel & wife, 6 Leigh 9.

The proposition in Park on Dower p. 302, 3, that even where the husband does not die seized, the wife may become entitled to damages against his alienee

520 *from the time of demand and refusal of her dower, is not supported by the authorities there cited. And Park himself lays down the proposition doubtingly. On the other hand, though the husband die seized, the widow may lose the right to damages from his death, by laches in demanding her dower. Co. Litt. 32 b.; Delver v. Hunter, Bunb. 57.

It is suggested, however, that the rights of the widow have been recognized by the grantees under her husband, and that such recognition is equivalent to the institution of a suit for dower, which was thereby rendered unnecessary. But it appears that in 1820 the land company refused to make any further payments to the widow, and informed her that she might proceed to have her dower in the land assigned, if she thought proper. The payments previously made by the company can only be considered as made under a mistaken impression of their rights, and cannot bind them after the mistake has been discovered. The widow has received what she had no title to, and her representative ought to consider himself fortunate that he is not compelled to refund. She had no estate in the land previous to assignment of dower, but a mere right of action (1 Lomax's Digest p. 92,) and therefore there is no pretence for supposing that the defendants held the land as the joint property of the widow and themselves, accountable to her for a share of the rents and profits.

III. Unless the defendants were tenants of the freehold, the suit for dower cannot be maintained against them. The plaintiff, claiming as dowress, must admit that they have an estate in the land of which she may be endowed. A writ of dower, certainly, could not be maintained against any except a tenant of the freehold; and equity follows the law, where the dowress, instead of suing at law, resorts to the court of chancery. The suggestion that these parties have no title to the land, but are mere tortfeasors, having only a wrongful possession, is made for the first time in this court.

521 *IV. The foregoing views are presented on the supposition that the defendants have received rents and profits to which the widow as tenant in dower might possibly have a claim. We contend, however, that the profits received by the defendants were derived from a subject in which the widow as tenant in dower had no sort of interest. They were derived from the severance and sale of the timber on the land, which constituted the whole value. Where timber growing on land is severed therefrom, whether accidentally or by design, the party entitled to the first estate of inheritance in the land is entitled to the timber, and may maintain trover for it; and no other person has any right to the same. 2 Wms. Saund. 47b., note (f); Farrant v. Thompson, 5 Barn. & Ald. 826; 7 Eng. C. L. Rep. 272. Both at common law and by the statute (1 R. C. of 1819, p. 462, ch. 117, § 1,) the dowress in possession is chargeable for waste; and it is the settled doctrine in England that it is waste in a tenant for life to cut timber growing on the land. And though what is waste in England is not in all cases waste in this country, and the dowress may cut away timber for the purpose of clearing and improving land which would otherwise be valueless or nearly so,—for the purpose of enjoying the land in the only mode in which it can be enjoyed, that is, by cultivation (Findlay v. Smith & Co., 6 Munf. 148, opinion of Roane, J.)—yet she cannot here, any more than in England, do that which tends to the disherison of the heir, or the destruction or lasting damage of the inheritance. Here the timber constituted the whole value of the land; and to allow the widow to cut and sell the timber in such a case, would be allowing her to impair, or rather to destroy, the inheritance itself. In 7 Bac. Abr. 261, it is laid down that a tenant for life of land which is altogether in woods, is still not entitled to cut the timber, though no profit could be de-522 rived *from it in any other mode.

The case of Crouch v. Puryear & Co., 1 Rand. 258, which decides that a dowress may work an old mine, decides also that she has no right to open a new one. Her rights in that respect are the same in England and in this country. In this case the question is different; namely, how far the undoubted law of England as to waste in cutting timber has been modified among us. In New York, a rule applicable to the circumstances of the country has been adopted, and the tenant is allowed to clear a portion of the land for cultivation. Jackson v. Brownson, 7 Johns. R. 227. This (which is also the rule adopted in this state, as appears by the case of Findlay v. Smith &c.) is the utmost extent to which the modification of the english law has been carried. In Massachusetts, it has been held that a widow is not dowable of wild lands at all. Conner v. Shepherd, 15 Mass. R. 164. Here the land was wholly unfit for cultivation; the only profit was to be made by cutting down and selling the timber. If to sever the timber from such land for such a purpose be waste, it should seem that the widow was not entitled to be endowed of the land at all: for it is laid down by Bracton (as cited in Park on Dower p. 115,) that a woman cannot claim a thing in dower, unless she may use and enjoy the thing of which she is dowable sine vasto, exilio et destructione.

In Pigot v. Bullock, 1 Ves. jun. 479, it was decided that until the estate of tenant for life comes into possession, he has no right to an account of underwood wrongfully cut by a preceding tenant. Here the dowress had no estate at all in the land when the timber was cut, and therefore would have been entitled to no account of the profits derived from that source, even though the cutting had been wrongful. But the parties against whom the account is claimed were entitled to the inheritance of the land, and were guilty of no wrong in cutting the timber.

523 *V. It is submitted that the objection for multifariousness in the bill is sufficiently taken by the answer of the Dismal Swamp land company. But if no such objection had been made, the authorities cited by the counsel for Griffin establish that the bill might nevertheless have been dismissed for that cause at the hearing.

R. G. Scott, in reply, insisted upon the following points: 1. That the doctrine of waste, as it exists in England, is not applicable to the woodlands of this country; that a widow is dowable of such lands, though she can no otherwise derive profits from them but by the severance and sale of the timber; and that the measure of her right is one third of the net annual profits, as in the case of an open mine. On this subject, he examined and commented upon the cases of Findlay v. Smith &c. and Crouch v. Puryear &c. (before cited) and Stoughton v. Leigh, 1 Taunt. 402,—2. That Macaulay, having made no absolute alienation of the land, but a mere incumbrance thereof for the payment of debts, was to be considered as dying seized, and his widow as entitled to profits from the time of her husband's death; according to the cases of Swaine v. Perine (before cited) and Banks

v. Sutton, 2 P. Wms. 700,—3. That even supposing here was an absolute alienation by the husband during the coverture, the widow would be entitled to damages from the time of her demand of dower. Park on Dower p. 302, 2 Wms. Saund. 44d, note 4; and in this case such demand was both made and acceded to very early after the death of the husband. 4. That if this case stood only upon the same grounds as Tod v. Baylor and Thomas v. Gammel & wife, mrs. Macaulay would at least be entitled to profits from the date of the subpoena. 5. That her right to profits (from whatever period commencing) was not lost by her death pending the suit, but passed to her personal representative; Curtis v. Curtis, 2 Bro. C. C. 620,—6. That in 524 *this case all questions as to the widow's right to be endowed, as to her proper share of the profits, or as to the period from which the account should be taken, were entirely precluded by the acts and admissions of the defendants themselves; and in that respect the case was different from all those which had been cited for the appellees. 7. To shew that the objection of multifariousness in the bill, rather of misjoinder of defendants, taken by Griffin and the executor of Jameson, has no application to such a case as this, he cited and relied upon Story's Eq. Pl. p. 229, 230, and notes there. At all events, he contended, the objection could only have been made available by demurrer. Id. p. 203, § 237, note 2. As to the alleged staleness of the claim, Griffin was not entitled to make that objection, since he had neither pleaded the statute of limitations nor demurred to the bill; Id. p. 389, § 503, note 4. And the objection, though made by Jameson's executor in his answer, was sufficiently obviated by the circumstances of excuse stated in the bill. In respect to the plea of Jameson's executor to the jurisdiction of the court, upon the alleged ground of his residence out of the former district and present circuit, it was sufficient to remark that the fact was put in issue by the plaintiff's replication, and no proof of it had been adduced.

BALDWIN, J. The law gives dower to the widow, as a source of income for the maintenance of herself and family. It is a provision founded in justice and humanity, and highly favoured both at law and in equity. Her essential right is to the profits of one third of her husband's real estate of inheritance, whereof he was seized at any time during the coverture; and she is entitled for that purpose to the several possession of one third of the subject, if susceptible of a division by metes and bounds. If the subject be not so partible, still she is admitted to her due participation of the profits; *and the mode of enjoyment is adapted to the nature of the case. The nature of the property is wholly immaterial, as regards the right to dower, provided it be, or savour of, the realty; and this is equally true in regard to the nature of its products. Thus a widow is dowerable of lands, whether arable, meadow, or woodland; of manors, houses, mills and factories; of rents, whether rent-charge, rentseck, or rentservise; of dove-cotes and warrens; of fairs, markets, ferries and fisheries; of common certain, gross or appendant; of advowsons, gross or appendant; of tithes; of shares in road or navigation companies, &c.

But the widow's enjoyment is, by reason of her limited estate, confined to the use and products of the property; and she may not despoil or waste it, to the disherison of the heir; she is to enjoy, but not abuse it; to take the profits, but not convert or break in upon the capital. Like other tenants for life, the restriction upon her exercise of ownership is to be found in the law of waste. What shall be considered waste is to be determined, in general, by the mode, not the extent, of enjoyment to which the tenant succeeds. The tenant is not at liberty to convert arable land into meadow, or meadow into arable land; nor a mill into a dwelling house or brewery; though not only the immediate profits, but the permanent value of the property, be thereby enhanced. The removal of the soil and minerals, and the opening of new mines, are also prohibited. But if mines have been opened or worked by one having authority as the owner of the fee, the dowress may continue to work them, and that without stint; and moreover sink new shafts for the purpose, into the same mine, vein, bed or body of the mineral so devoted to the yielding of profit.

Waste in woods is to a great extent, though not exclusively, governed by the general rule already mentioned. In the country from which we derive our laws, *timber is of such importance that it enters largely into the value of the subject, and its preservation is deemed essential to the protection of the inheritance. The tenant is therefore prohibited from cutting it at all. To this there are some exceptions, arising out of the duty and wants of the tenant; to whom certain estovers are allowed, for the reparation of the buildings and enclosures, the construction of agricultural implements, and for the supply of fuel. These involve a question as to the extent of the tenant's enjoyment; and that depends, more or less, upon the exigencies of the occasion, the abundance or scarcity of the material, and the local usages of the county or vicinage.

In regard to mines, the english doctrine (for which see Stoughton v. Leigh, 1 Taunt. 402,) is not unsuitable to the condition of our country, and has been recognized in Crouch v. Puryear &c., 1 Rand. 258, and Coates v. Cheever, 1 Cowen 460. As to waste in woods, though the principle which prevents timber from being cut, to the detriment of the inheritance, is the same in both countries, yet the application here of the rigid rule that prevails in England would defeat its own purpose. Instead of the scarcity existing there, we have often a superabundance here, and the clearing of lands, to a greater or less extent according to circumstances, may enhance instead of diminishing the value of the property. With us, therefore, the restraint upon the power of the tenant for life ought, in this respect, to have reference not to the mode but to the extent of enjoyment. In England, the tenant may cut and sell the coppice and undergrowth, and even young timber trees under a certain age, at seasonable times, 1 Lomax's Dig. 52; Pigot v. Bullock, 1 Ves. jun. 479; and the reason assigned is, that no advantage can arise to a tenant for life from woods of that kind, but by the sale of them: and what shall be considered timber trees there depends in some measure upon local usages, arising out of the peculiar *growths of various tracts of country. Here it is enough that the tenant does no wanton mischief, and leaves a sufficient supply of timber for the wants of him in remainder or reversion.

That the law of waste, in its application here, must be varied and accommodated to the circumstances of our new and comparatively unsettled country, was recognized by all the judges who noticed that topic, in Findlay v. Smith &c., 6 Munf. 134. And chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, vol. 4, p. 76, says, that the american doctrine on the subject of waste is somewhat varied from the english law, and is more enlarged and better accommodated to the condition of a new and growing country. The proposition is well sustained by adjudged cases. In Jackson v. Brownson, 7 Johns. R. 227, it was held that the tenant may clear part of wild and uncultivated land for the purpose of cultivation, but must leave wood and timber sufficient for the permanent use of the farm; and that it is a question of fact for a jury, what extent of wood may be cut down in such cases without exposing the party to the charge of waste. In North Carolina, it has been held not to be waste to clear tillable land for the necessary support of the tenant's family, though the timber be destroyed in clearing. Parkins v. Coxe, 2 Hayw. 339. And in Pennsylvania, in the case of Hastings v. Crunckleton, 3 Yeates 261, the court said, it was an outrage upon common sense to apply the english law of waste to a widow's use of uncleared dower land in this country; and held that she may clear, if she do not exceed the relative proportion of cleared land, considering the tract as a whole.

In the case before us, the widow's claim was to dower in a large tract of swamp land, incapable of cultivation, and stated in the answer of the principal defendants (the Dismal Swamp land company) to be "no otherwise productive or valuable than by working the timber, and *making sale thereof when converted into shingles." If a tenant for life cannot have the use of it for that purpose, it is to such tenant utterly worthless, and a mere burthen. If a dowress may not enjoy it in the only mode of which it is susceptible, she may be left to starve, though her husband's whole capital has been invested in it with a view to annual profits. It is said, that if it cannot be enjoyed but by cutting down and selling the timber, that being waste, it serves to shew that she cannot be endowed at all. But this is founded upon the idea that she is not at liberty to cut down the timber except for the purpose of tillage; a proposition which, to my mind, cannot be maintained. She may, as I conceive, in such a case as this, cut down the timber ad libitum, and make all the profit of it she can, provided she does not thereby prevent the reversioner from making the like profit. By our law of waste in woods, the restraint upon the tenant has reference not to the mode but the extent of enjoyment. If enough be left for the successor to the inheritance, he has no cause of complaint; and what will be enough is a question of fact, to be determined upon all the circumstances of the case. In cases like this, the extent of the tract, the quantity of timber, the period of reproduction, the demands of the market, the expenses of the employment, are all elements of the enquiry; and if these should lead in such cases to a just and convenient rule of uniform application, I presume it will be this, that the tenant's use of the timber shall be so restricted as to leave to the successive tenants and owners an equally extensive use of it, at least.

There are other facts in this cause which give additional force to the widow's claim of dower. Her right was not only admitted, but the substantial enjoyment of it allowed, for several years, by the defendants now in possession. In the years 1816 and 1817, the Dismal Swamp land company made 529 payments to her on account *of her interest in the profits, and took from her bonds conditioned for refunding the moneys in case an adverse title should be established as paramount to that of her husband; in which bonds her right as dowress to one third of the timber worked by the company is distinctly stated: and in 1825 an order was made by the company for a further payment to her on the same account, which payment had been previously directed by a former order in the year 1818. Her right had also been recognized by the trustees in the deed of trust from her husband (under which all the defendants claimed), and payments made to her by the trustees of one third of the dividends of proceeds, in February and November 1801.

Whether these circumstances were equivalent to an actual assignment of dower, I deem it unnecessary to enquire. They surely amount to such a recognition of the widow's right, as to dispense with all evidence on her part, and throw the whole burthen of proof on the other side. The bill charges, not only that the husband was and died seized of his undivided moiety of the land, but that, previous to as well as since his death, the timber was worked, and large profits derived from the sale of shingles &c. This allegation is not denied by the answer of the Dismal Swamp land company, and under the circumstances above mentioned must be taken as true as respects those defendants, at least until disproved.

The case is thus presented of a dowress succeeding to a mode of enjoyment of the property adopted by the husband himself; and is not unlike the case of an open mine, which unquestionably may be worked by her to any extent. It is, in truth, a mine upon the surface; not of minerals, incapable of renewal, but of vegetable matter, in a constant course of spontaneous reproduction. The right of a dowress to work such timber has been recognized in North 530 Carolina; for in *Ballentine v. Poyner, 2 Hayw. 110, it was admitted that the tenant in dower may use timber for making staves and shingles, when that is the ordinary use, and the only use, to be made of such lands.

The widow having died pending this suit, her right to dower is only important as it affects the claim of her executor to mesne profits till the period of her death. Though at law the damages for mesne profits are lost by the death of either plaintiff or defendant in dower before judgment therefor, it is well settled to be otherwise in equity, from the consideration that the profits of a third part of her husband's real estate are her only subsistence from his death. 1 Roper on Husband and Wife p. 452.

But the plaintiff's claim to mesne profits is resisted, upon the authority of Thomas v. Gammel & wife, 6 Leigh 9, and Tod v. Baylor, 4 Leigh 498. In the former, it was held that mesne profits cannot be recovered at law by the widow against the alienee of her husband, because the statute of Merton, adopted into our code, gives damages only where the husband dies seized; and in the latter, that they cannot be recovered in equity, which conforms to the law in this respect. These cases give the rule where the husband in his lifetime has conveyed the land to a purchaser; but they have no application to incumbrances by mortgage or deed of trust, which are only securities for the payment of money, and still leave the grantor owner of the estate. Where the husband sells and conveys the estate by an absolute deed, though during the coverture, there is nothing left in him; and therefore, though the wife who has not united is entitled to dower, because he was at one time seized during the coverture, yet she cannot recover damages or mesne profits against the alienee, because her right to these is founded upon the statute of Merton, which requires the husband to have died seized. But where the land is mortgaged by the husband after marriage, he is 531 *to be regarded as seized until foreclosure; and even where the wife has united in the mortgage, she is entitled not only to dower in the equity of redemption, but to an account of the mesne profits from the death of her husband. He is to be considered as having died seized of the equity of redemption; or of the real estate subject to the mortgage; and in such case the settled course is to compute the rents and profits from the husband's death. Swaine v. Perine, 5 Johns. Ch. R. 482; Hale v. James, 6 Id. 258.

The case of the incumbrance in question cannot be distinguished from a mortgage, or ordinary deed of trust, to secure the payment of money. It contains, indeed, no clause of redemption, and provides that the trustees, so soon as they conveniently can, shall sell the property conveyed, and out of the proceeds pay the debts specifically mentioned as intended to be secured, and pay the residue, if any, to the use of any other creditors of the grantor. Still, however, an equity of redemption was inherent in the very nature of the instrument, and none of the cestuis que trust could have been entitled to more of the proceeds than enough to satisfy their demands.

In this case, there is nothing to prevent an account of the mesne profits from the time of the husband's death, as respects the defendants originally accountable, against whom the claim has been asserted in due time. For reasons already suggested, the husband must be regarded as having been seized during the coverture and at the time of his death. In equity, the account of mesne profits is usually given from the time of the husband's death, the widow being prima facie entitled from the time her right to endowment accrued; and some reason must be shewn by the defendant to limit the account. 1 Roper on Husband and Wife p. 453; Oliver v. Richardson, 9 Ves. 222. The statute of limitations is no bar, either at law or in equity. Ibid. The mesne profits 532 *are assessed upon the defendants respectively, according to the time of their respective enjoyment of the land. Hazen v. Thurbur, 4 Johns. Ch. R. 604.

There is no reason why the defendants in possession, the Dismal Swamp land company, should not account for one third of the whole of the clear profits received by them from their undivided moiety of the 8000 acres, subject to credits for the payments made by them to the widow; nor why that account should not be brought down to the period of the widow's death. It is too late to enquire (if that was ever proper) whether the timber was worked to such extent, that the widow's share of it would exceed what she would have been entitled to if her dower had been assigned to her by metes and bounds. The course of conduct pursued by the principal defendants has been such as in itself to preclude any enquiry of that sort, as respects them. After having recognized her right to one third of the profits for a number of years, and making her payments from time to time on that basis, they were not justifiable in refusing to continue that mode of adjustment, at least until dower was formally assigned. It is true they say in their answer, that in the year 1820 they disclaimed all future operations on the former plan, and informed the widow that she might have her dower assigned and laid off in the land. But of this there is no proof; and if there were, it was their duty, at least after what had occurred, to assign the dower specifically, and, as that could not be done without partition with their tenant in common, to procure such partition.

As regards the trustees, and the executor of Jameson, I think the plaintiff is entitled to no account, and that the bill was properly dismissed as to them. The bill upon its face shews a delay, without excuse, of more than twenty years in calling them to an account. The surviving trustee swears positively that he paid over to the widow every dollar for which he and his co-533 trustee *were accountable, and exhibits vouchers in proof of his allegation. The widow, by her own shewing in her bill, prosecuted to recovery a suit against the executor of Jameson, for her share of the profits received by him; and the only pretext for a further demand, and that without a shadow of proof, is that she did not recover enough.

It may be doubted whether it was proper to make the representatives of Sexton the copatentee and tenant in common with the husband, and those claiming under them, parties in this suit, by the amended bill, filed after the widow's death; inasmuch as no assignment of dower could then be sought, and if the plaintiff can have any claim against them, it must grow altogether out of a settlement of accounts between them and the Dismal Swamp land company. But as they have never answered, and the bill has been taken for confessed against them, and it is possible that in the progress of the account to be directed the propriety of convening them may be made to appear, I think it was premature to dismiss the bill in regard to those defendants.

My opinion is, that the decree of the circuit court is erroneous in dismissing the plaintiff's bill, except as against the trustees and Jameson's executor; and that it ought to be reversed, and an account directed of the plaintiff's one third of the mesne profits received by the Dismal Swamp land company prior to the widow's death, and of the payments made to her by them; with a view to a decree for any balance which may be found due to the plaintiff.

ALLEN, J., concurred in the opinion delivered by judge Baldwin.

BROOKE, J. The company having acknowledged the right of the widow to one third of the profits of the land in which she 534 claims dower, by paying her from time to *time her portion of those profits, it is now too late for them to question that right. The objection that the subject is such that she cannot claim dower has nothing in it. The timber on the land being the only subject of profit, the destruction of her portion of it cannot make her liable to the charge of committing waste, as in other cases at the common law, in which timber belongs to the reversioner, with the exception of housebote, firebote, &c. Had the company refused to pay her one third of the profits, the suit would have been brought at an earlier period, when her dower in the land would have been assigned her. As to the time from which she was entitled to one third of the profits, this case is not like that of Tod v. Baylor. In that case the husband did not die seized of the land, and the court thought the widow was only entitled to profits from the issuing of the subpoena, with the exception of the president, who thought that she was only entitled to profits from the date of the decree. In the case before us, the deed of trust executed by the husband was an incumbrance only, and he died seized of the land. The widow was therefore entitled to profits from the death of her husband to the time of her own death, according to the statute of Merton, adopted in our act concerning dower. I therefore concur in the decree that has been agreed on by the court.

The decree of the court of appeals was entered in the following terms:

This court is of opinion that the decree of the circuit superior court is erroneous, except so far as the same dismisses the bill of the appellant against the trustees of Alexander Macaulay, and the executor of John Jameson: therefore it is decreed and ordered, that the said decree, so far as the same is above declared to be erroneous, be reversed and annulled, and that the residue thereof be affirmed, and also that the company do pay unto the appellant his costs by him expended in the prosecution of his appeal aforesaid here, and further that the appellant, out of the estate of his testatrix in his hands to be administered, do pay unto the appellees the representatives of John Jameson, Thomas Griffin and Thomas Nelson their costs by them about their defence in this behalf expended. And it is ordered that the cause be remanded to the said circuit superior court, with instructions to direct an account of the appellant's testatrix's one third of the mesne profits received by the Dismal Swamp land company prior to her death, and of the payments made to her by them, with a view to a decree for any balance which may be found due to the appellant.

Joint Contract—Discharge of One—Effect.—Where two or more are jointly bound by contract, the legal remedy must be pursued against all. And if, by act of the claimant in such joint contract, one or more of the parties jointly bound be discharged, so that all cannot be subjected to a joint judgment, none are liable on the joint contract. Per STANARD, J.

Partnership—Bond Given by Active Partner—Right to Bring Action on Simple Contract against Dormant Partner.*—Mercantile business being carried on in a single name, the merchant in whose name the business is conducted buys goods, and executes a specialty for the price thereof. The party who sells the goods and takes the specialty is ignorant at the time that the merchant has a dormant partner. Discovering this fact after the death of the merchant who gave the specialty, he then brings an action of assumpsit for the price of the goods against the dormant partner. Held, the creditor has no legal remedy on the simple contract, the same being extinguished by the specialty: dissentiente BALDWIN, J.

This was an action of assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, brought in the circuit court of Fauquier county by John Motter against Berkeley Ward, as surviving partner of Robert Fisher and Berkeley Ward, who were copartners under the name of Robert Fisher. The defendant pleaded the general issue. At the trial a special verdict was returned, whereby it was found, that the defendant and Fisher entered into a copartnership to carry on the saddling business, and the same was carried on in the name of Robert Fisher; that while the said business was so carried on, Motter sold and delivered to Fisher the articles in the declaration mentioned, for and on account of himself and Ward, to be used in and about their said joint business of saddling; that at the time the same were so sold and delivered, Fisher executed and delivered to Motter a sealed obligation, in the name of Robert Fisher, for the 537 payment of the price *thereof on demand; and that the time of the execution and delivery of the said sealed obligation, as well as the time of the sale and delivery of the goods, Motter was ignorant that Ward was concerned with Fisher as a partner in the business.

Upon the facts so found by the verdict, the circuit court was of opinion that the law was for the plaintiff, and rendered judgment in his favour. On the petition of Ward, a supersedeas was awarded.

G. N. Johnson for plaintiff in error. The obligation under seal extinguished the simple contract, and assumpsit did not lie on it. Starkie on Evid. part IV. vol. 2, p.

Partnership—Judgment against One or More Partners—Effect as to Those Omitted.—In McArthur v. Chase, 13 Gratt. 701, it is said: "In all cases where the creditor takes a judgment against one or more of the members of a general partnership, omitting others, he loses thereby all recourse at law against the latter, even though they be dormant partners, and unknown at the time to the creditor. The joint contract is held to be merged in the judgment as to the members against whom it is obtained; and being so merged, is equally barred as to the others, since no joint suit can be maintained upon it. Collyer on Part. 650, and cases cited in notes: Ward v. Motter, 2 Rob. 536." See also, citing the principal case, Brown v. Johnson, 13 Gratt. 651.

See monographic note on "Partnership."

128, and note j.;* 1 Chitty's Pl. 119;† Sheehy v. Mandeville &c., 6 Cranch 253; 2 Tuck. Comm. 137, 8. And though the debt by simple contract be the debt of two, and the bond be given by only one of the debtors, the simple contract is nevertheless merged in the specialty, especially where the bond is given at the time of the contract. Pudsey's case, cited 2 Leon. 110. Nor is the case different because the debt is a partnership debt. Tom v. Goodrich and others, 2 Johns. R. 213, is a case of a bond given by one of several partners for a debt of all, in which it was yet held that the simple contract debt was thereby extinguished. The other partners not having delegated the authority to bind by deed, the taking the deed of one is evidence of intention to look to him alone. Story on Partn. 211-220, especially § 134, 138, 139, 140, also p. 239, § 155. A party dealing with a partner knows that no matter how many partners there are, and whether they be dormant or known, the contract of one is the contract of all, if evidenced by bill or note. Not so when he takes a bond. He 538 takes that, knowing it cannot be the bond of the others, *at least that they cannot be bound at law. The cases in this court of Sale v. Dishman's ex'ors, 3 Leigh 548; Galt's ex'ors v. Calland's ex'or, 7 Leigh 594; M'Cullough & al. v. Sommerville, 8 Leigh 437, and Weaver v. Tapscott, 9 Leigh 424, shew that one ground which will entitle the creditor to come into equity against the representatives of other partners is, that the debt is extinguished at law by a higher security being given.

Morson and Leigh for defendant in error. The decision of the circuit court rests upon the rule that a dormant partner may be held liable when discovered. Watson on Partn. 42; Gow 176, 7; Smith's Merc. Law 21, 22; Hoare v. Dawes, 1 Dougl. 371; Robinson v. Wilkinson, 3 Price 547; 1 Eng. Excheq. Rep. 422. In this last case it is laid down by baron Richards as "clear law, that a dormant partner cannot discharge himself from liability to pay the debts of a creditor through the medium of his ostensible partner, by any acts of his during the concealment of the unknown partner." Sheehy v. Mandeville &c., 6 Cranch 253, is also in point. It was there held that a judgment recovered against the ostensible partner on his note did not merge the original simple contract of that partner and his dormant partner. A fortiori the specialty of one cannot operate as a merger. In Leslie v. Wilson, 3 Brod. & Bingh. 171; 7 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 395, the specialty was by one of the parties liable on the original contract, and it was received at the time of the transaction; but there, as here, the creditor was ignorant of the joint liability, and that joint liability was held not to be extinguished. Reasoning by analogy brings us to the same result. An unknown principal may be made liable when discovered. Story on Agency p. 453, 4, § 446; Smith's Merc. Law 65, 6; Wilson &c. v. Hart, 7 Taunt. 295; 2 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 112; Nelson v. Powell, 3 Dougl. 410; 26 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 168; Thomson v. Davenport 539 and others, 9 *Barn. & Cress. 78; 17 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 335. The principle is the same here; each member of the firm being an agent for his principal, the firm. Smith's Merchant, Law 19; Story on Agency p. 42, § 39, p. 113, § 124, p. 116, § 126, note.

But even had it been known at the time of the transaction that ward was a partner, there was no merger. The merger only takes place when all the parties bound in the debt of lower dignity become bound in the debt of higher dignity. 3 Bac. Abr. Extinguishment, D. p. 548 of Lond. edi. of 1832; Sheehy v. Mandeville &c., 6 Cranch 253. The bond of one may be taken as satisfaction for the prior debt of several, but it must be proved to have been so agreed, otherwise it is cumulative, and not an extinguishment. Smith's Merc. Law 22; Story on Agency p. 151, § 161; Twopenny &c. v. Young, 3 Barn. & Cress. 208; 10 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 54; Day &c. v. Leal &c., 14 Johns. R. 404; White v. Cuyler, 6 T. R. 176. In Taylor's adm'r v. The Bank of Alexandria, 5 Leigh 477, the doctrine is announced, that there is no extinguishment unless it be proved that the bond was accepted as a satisfaction. A similar proposition is laid down in The United States v. Lyman, 1 Mason 482. The remedy on the bond was there considered collateral and cumulative. And the decision is directly in opposition to that in Tom v. Goodrich and others; Enders &c. v. Brune, 4 Rand. 438, is also opposed to that case. Kyles v. Roberts's ex'or and others, 6 Leigh 495, and the other decisions of this court cited on the other side, shewing that there is no extinguishment in equity, are authorities in our favour. As the rule is established in equity, and there is no reason for a different rule at law, it should be considered as equally governing there. In holding that there is no extinguishment, the cases go upon the ground that no extinguishment was intended. And a court of law, in regard to the intention, must 540 upon the same facts come to the *same conclusion. A release cannot be given by an act which was not intended to release. It is no answer to say, that if we are right on the ground we take, equity would not have had jurisdiction in those cases. That is not so. In Sale v. Dishman's ex'ors there was no remedy at law because the suit was against the representative of a deceased partner. So also in Galt's ex'ors v. Calland's ex'or; and besides, in that case there was a trust fund which it was sought to reach. M'Cullough & others v. Somerville falls within the same predicament. And Weaver v.

Tapscott is a case in which a surety went into equity on the principle of substitution. There is nothing then in those cases leading to the conclusion that the specialty takes away the remedy at law.

G. N. Johnson in reply. When goods are sold, and at the time of sale the bond of a third person is delivered, it must, upon these facts alone, be taken that the obligor is the only person liable. This is the doctrine of Pudsey's case, recognized in Hooper's case, 2 Leon. 110. The case is the same, if on a sale to two partners the bond of one be given in payment. Nor does it make any difference whether the existence of the partnership was known to the vendor or not. The cases in which a creditor, finding out partners that had been unknown to him, may proceed against them, are all cases of simple contract, in which there was no specialty. Such was Robinson v. Wilkinson. The opinion of baron Richards was not intended to bear upon a case circumstanced like this. He alludes to such securities as merchants are in the habit of taking; to bills of exchange and notes, not to bonds. Judge Marshall's opinion in Sheehy v. Mandeville &c. has been the subject of animadversion in other cases. Gow on Partn. 194; Robertson v. Smith & others, 18 Johns. R. 459.

It by no means follows, however, that 541 because a judgment would *not extinguish, a bond will not. In the case of the judgment, there is no act having for its object the extinguishment. In the case of a bond, there is an active agency to extinguish, when the creditor takes it. And he is not obliged to take it unless he pleases. Drake v. Mitchell and others, 3 East. 258, proceeds on the ground that the security was not of a higher nature: if it had been, the judgment, it may be inferred, would have been otherwise. The proposition in 3 Bac. Abr. 548, is, that where a stranger gives the bond, it is not a satisfaction unless accepted as such. It does not go the length of holding that there is no extinguishment where one of the parties gives the bond. In Willings &c. v. Consequa, 1 Peters' C. C. R. 306, judge Washington adverts to the rule in respect to a bond given by a stranger, and holds that it does not apply to the case of a bond given by one of two or more joint contractors. This case is cited with approbation in Penny v. Martin, 4 Johns. Ch. Rep. 569. In Robertson v. Smith &c., 18 Johns. R. 478, Spencer, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, cites Wilkes v. Jackson, 2 Hen. & Munf. 355, 361, in which it was decided that a judgment for damages in a separate action against one of several joint trespassers is a bar to an action against the rest. He remarks, however, that there is a wide difference between a judgment against one of several tortfeasors, and against one of several joint debtors. "In the latter case," he says, "whatever extinguishes or merges the debt as to one, merges it as to all." Now clearly the simple contract is extinguished as to the one who gives the specialty. Then suppose, after the specialty is given by one, an action be brought against the other upon the joint simple contract, could such an action be maintained? Here, to be sure, the action is against a surviving partner; but the question is the same as if, immediately after the bond was given, the action had been brought against the dormant partner in the lifetime of the other. A

542 *bond by one is as much an extinguishment as to both, as a release to one. And the party taking the bond must be presumed to know that if there be a dormant partner, the bond will extinguish the claim against him. Leslie v. Wilson, cited on the other side, is fully reported in 6 J. B. Moore 415. The counsel who argued that case took care to distinguish it from a case of a contract. If the original liability there had only been of one party, and he had given a bond, still the action might have been maintained. Taylor's adm'r v. The Bank of Alexandria, 5 Leigh 477, is not a case of a bond given by one of two jointly bound, but the case of a bond given by a guarantee, who was only collaterally bound, and the bond therefore could only extinguish that collateral liability, leaving the original contract of the principal in force. The United States v. Lyman, 1 Mason 482, perhaps shakes the decision in Tom v. Goodrich and others, so far as the latter considers a debt to the United States for duties to be extinguished by the bond for such duties. But there is nothing in it which at all shakes the decision in Tom v. Goodrich and others as an authority upon the general principle applicable to this case. It is a principle which has been repeatedly acted on. Clement v. Brush, 3 Johns. Cas. 180. The extinguishment results from a fixed rule of law, and is not a question merely of intent. Chitty on Contracts p. 6; Toussaint v. Martinant, 2 T. R. 100. The decision of this court in Galt's ex'ors v. Calland's ex'or, 7 Leigh 594, and the opinion of Parker, J., in Weaver v. Tapscott, 9 Leigh 424, proceed manifestly upon the ground that no redress could be had at law. All the authorities are sought to be gotten over by the doctrine in relation to dormant partners, and the opinion of baron Richards. But the answer is, that a dormant partner is never to be charged any further than if he had been present and had participated in the transaction; and that the dictum of 543 baron Richards is in a *case which did not call for it, and was, besides, never meant to be applied to such cases as this.

BALDWIN, J. The liability of a dormant partner depends not upon the terms, or the form, or the dignity of the contract between the creditor and the ostensible partner, but upon the relation which the dormant partner bears to the subject of and the parties to the contract. The creditor, ignorant of the existence of the dormant partner, has of course no transaction whatever with him, but deals exclusively with the ostensible partner, looks to his credit and responsibility alone, and never speculates upon the mere possibility of a dormant partner who may thereafter be accidentally discovered. The law subjects the dormant partner upon considerations of justice and policy. It is just that he who participates in the benefits should also be responsible of the engagements of the concern; and it would lead to much inconvenience and fraud, if the demands of creditors, growing out of the partnership business, should be affected by the secrecy of the connexion between the partners. This liability of the dormant partner, by operation of law, cannot be frustrated by any arrangements between the creditor and the ostensible partner; for such, in the nature of things, cannot be the intent of the creditor; and though it may be and usually is the intention of the ostensible as well as the dormant partner, that very intention it is the object of the law to overrule and defeat. It follows that all such arrangements, of whatever nature, whether by the separate security of the ostensible partner, or otherwise, are merely collateral to that joint undertaking which the law forces upon the members of the firm; an undertaking based upon the consideration which has enured to the benefit of the partnership, and governed by a rule broader than the stipulations of contracts, "qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus."

544 *The remedy, however, against the dormant partner must conform to his joint responsibility, and he cannot be sued alone, unless the objection be waived by his failure to plead it in abatement. The creditor may bring his action against the dormant and ostensible partners upon their joint implied promise, raised by the law out of the joint consideration; as where goods are sold or money advanced to the partnership, though without the creditor's knowledge of its existence at the time of his thus dealing with the ostensible partner. Or, where there is an express contract, the terms of which embrace the dormant partner, though unintentionally, as if there be several ostensible partners and also a dormant partner, and a security be given by the partnership, for example a promissory note payable by A. B. & co. or A. B., C. D. & co. the creditor may join the dormant partner in an action thereupon, inasmuch as he falls within the description of the firm. But if the terms of the security do not embrace the dormant partner, as if it be made payable by A. B. or by A. B. and C. D. the ostensible partner or partners, the dormant partner cannot be joined in an action thereupon.

The liability of the dormant partner, moreover, is not absolute, but dependant upon the election of the creditor; and that election must be made in due time, and by a proper course of proceeding. In Hoare v. Dawes, 1 Doug. 371, it was said by lord Mansfield, that a dormant partner is liable when discovered. But I do not understand him to mean whenever discovered, or whatever may have been the proceedings against the ostensible partner; but only that though the dealing has been with the ostensible partner alone, yet the dormant partner may be subjected, if discovered. The creditor must however take care that he do not, by proceeding upon the joint contract, implied or express, against the ostensible partner alone, thereby lose his remedy against the dormant partner. If he brings his action upon the 545 *implied promise, that being joint, he must not omit the dormant partner; for if he proceeds to judgment against the ostensible partner alone, he cannot afterwards maintain an action against the dormant partner, who may meet a separate suit by a plea in abatement, and a joint suit by shewing that the promise is no longer joint, it having been dissevered by the proceeding against his codefendant, as to whom transit in rem judicatam. So if the creditor brings his action upon a joint express promise, as in the case above supposed of a note payable by A. B. & co. or A. B., C. D. & co. the like result will follow from a separate judgment against the ostensible partners: another action cannot be subsequently maintained upon such joint promise. And in neither case will the objection in the subsequent action be answered by saying, that at the time of the separate judgment the dormant partner had not been discovered; for whether that has been the fault or the misfortune of the creditor, the recovery already had against the ostensible partner or partners presents an insurmountable obstacle; inasmuch as the law does not tolerate a second judgment against the same person upon the same cause of action. But where the express promise excludes the dormant partner, as in the case of a note given by the ostensible partner alone, a recovery thereupon against the latter presents no difficulty in the way of a subsequent action against him and the dormant partner, upon their joint implied promise; for a judgment upon a collateral security is no bar to a suit upon the original cause of action. Drake v. Mitchell, 3 East 251.

The case before us is unembarrassed by any separate proceedings on the part of the creditor against the ostensible partner. It is simply the case, as presented by the special verdict, of a sale of goods to the ostensible partner for the use and benefit of the partnership business, and a separate security taken from the ostensible partner

itor that the dormant partner was a member of the concern. No recovery has been had nor action brought upon the separate security of the ostensible partner, who has died; but the creditor, on discovering the dormant partner, has brought this action against him as the surviving member of the firm, upon the joint promise implied by law.

If the separate security given in this case by the ostensible partner were by simple contract, it is quite clear that the dormant partner would not be thereby exonerated. It is well settled that one simple contract, for the same consideration, does not extinguish another. If therefore a promissory note or bill of exchange be given for goods sold or money loaned, it does not bar the creditor's right of action founded upon the consideration; unless, from the negotiable character of the instrument, and the creditor's conduct or laches in relation thereto, the debtor is, in contemplation of law, subjected to the hazard of loss. Chitty on Bills p. 433. And if such note or bill be a separate security, it is immaterial, as to the effect of the instrument merely, whether it be given for a joint or a separate debt. It may be evidence that the debt was in its origin separate, or that the debt originally joint has been converted by a subsequent agreement into a separate debt; but if the fact be otherwise, if the debt was originally joint and has not been so converted into a separate debt, the separate security is merely collateral to the joint responsibility. Where there are several ostensible partners of a firm, it is often a question of difficult solution, whether the debt demanded be the debt of the partnership, or the separate debt of one of its members; and the difficulty arises out of the circumstance that a partnership is usually limited in its objects, and therefore the members of the firm individually have their separate interests and business transactions. The question in such cases turns, for the most part, upon the enquiry whether the credit

547 *was given substantially to the partnership, or to the individual. Each of the partners, from the nature of the social connexion, is the agent of the partnership, with authority to bind the members collectively in all matters within the scope of the partnership business, though not beyond it. Within this limit, each partner may pledge the credit of the firm, and his acts will be obligatory upon all, though the subject of the contract, as goods purchased or money borrowed, be applied by him to his individual purposes. On the other hand, he may pledge his individual credit exclusively; and if he does so, the other members will not be responsible, though the subject be applied by him to partnership purposes. And in the former case, it matters not whether, in point of form, the contract be made or a security given in his own name, or in that of the firm. Williams v. Donaghe's ex'or, 1 Rand. 304. These distinctions have but little application to the case of a dormant partner. The ostensible partner is the sole representative of the firm, and its business is conducted in his individual name. A credit to him in the partnership business is a credit to the firm; and the true criterion is whether his dealing enures to the concern or to the individual. On the one hand, he cannot pledge the firm for his individual purposes, without disclosing the partnership and professing to deal for its use; and on the other, he cannot avoid pledging the firm in his dealings for partnership purposes, without the like disclosure, and an express stipulation for his exclusive liability.

This view of the joint liability of a dormant partner, notwithstanding a simple contract security given by the ostensible partner, is well sustained by authority.

Judge Story, in his Law of Partnership, p. 215, § 138, says: "In the case of a dormant and secret partner, the credit is manifestly given only to the ostensible partner. Still, however, it is not treated as an exclusive credit: for the law in all 548 cases of this sort founds *its decision upon the ground that the creditor has had a choice or election of his debtor, which cannot be where the partner is dormant and unknown. The credit therefore is not deemed exclusive, but is binding upon all for whom the partner acts, if done in their business and for their benefit, as is the case in cases of agency for an unknown principal." And in another passage of the same work, the learned author, treating of the proof of debts in bankruptcy, says: "In cases of dormant partnerships, it is a general rule that the creditors who have dealt with the ostensible partner, not knowing that there is any dormant partner, have a right to treat their debts as joint debts or as separate debts, and have an election to prove the same against the joint estate, or against the separate estate of the ostensible partner."

Robinson v. Wilkinson, 3 Price 538; 1 Eng. Excheq. R. 417, was an action of assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, and the question was whether a concealed part-owner of a ship was liable for stores furnished the ship and master. The master drew bills for the demand on the ship's agents in London. Afterwards Cay, the ostensible owner, obtained indulgence from the plaintiff, by agreeing to accept bills, in lieu of the former, at three, four and six months, which the plaintiff drew on him, but which were dishonoured by Cay, who proved insolvent, and to prevent his bankruptcy agreed to pay a composition of thirteen shillings in the pound, which was secured by the acceptance of his friend Wilson of a bill drawn by Cay at eight months. This bill, which was negotiated by the plaintiff, was also dishonoured, both drawer and acceptor having become bankrupt before the bill was due. At the period of these several transactions, the plaintiff considered Cay as the sole owner of the ship, and did not know that the defendant was a part-owner. Immediately upon discovering this fact, the plaintiff made 549 a demand upon *the defendant, and he refusing, the action was brought, and the plaintiff recovered. The plaintiff's counsel relied upon the ground that the defendant was a dormant partner, as distinguishing the case from all those which go to determine that the acceptance by a creditor of one of several partners as his debtor works a discharge of the rest. Richards, baron, in his opinion, said: "The question is, whether this defendant is discharged by any thing that has taken place. Whatever effect any or all of these transactions might have had if Wilkinson had been known to be a partner of Cay, is entirely put out of this case, because the plaintiff certainly dealt entirely with Cay, and knew nothing of Wilkinson, who was nevertheless clearly prima facie liable. It is clear law that a dormant partner cannot discharge himself from liability to pay the debts of a creditor through the medium of his ostensible partner, by any acts of his during the concealment of the unknown partner. If it were otherwise, and this action be not maintainable, a door is widely opened to defraud creditors by means of dormant partnerships." The views of the other judges were substantially the same; for, without relying upon the unproductiveness of the bills independently, they all regarded the defendant's unknown interest in the concern as a controlling circumstance in the cause.

In Schermerhorn v. Loines, 7 Johns. R. 311, where a person supplied stores to a ship, of which there were several owners, on the order of one of them who acted as ship's husband, and took his note in payment, and gave a receipt in full, it was held to be no discharge of the other owners, especially as it did not appear that the plaintiff knew at the time that there were other owners.

In Reynolds v. Cleveland, 4 Cow. 282, it was held that the partners were all liable for articles furnished for the benefit of the partnership, though the vendor did not know of the existence of the partnership, and supposed *himself dealing with an individual partner, to whom he gave credit by charging him alone in his books, and though a special contract was signed by the vendor and that individual; inasmuch as the vendor had not taken him for his debtor knowing that there were other partners.

It will thus be seen that if the separate security in this case can exonerate the dormant partner, it must be by force of the scroll attached to the instrument by way of seal, which gives to it the dignity of a specialty. It is upon this ground that the counsel for the plaintiff in error has very properly placed the cause; and what I have said in regard to the effect of a separate security by simple contract, has been with a view to its due consideration. In that connexion, it is evident that the defence is purely technical, there being no principles of justice or policy which are not equally applicable to the separate security of the ostensible partner, whether it be by specialty or simple contract.

It is argued in the first place, on the part of the plaintiff in error, that he is not chargeable upon a simple contract, because none such has ever existed, the specialty being, in the very nature of the transaction, the whole contract on the subject, and the sole evidence of the debt. But this is to confound the contract itself, to wit, the reciprocal agreement of the parties for the sale of the goods at a given price or value, with the security given by one of them for its performance on his part. The contract has been executed on the part of the seller, and it may be has been extinguished on the part of the purchaser; but its very extinguishment supposes its previous existence, and whether for a month or a moment is immaterial. The authority relied upon by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, 2 Leonard 110. Hooper's case, and Pudsey's case there stated, is one of extinguishment.

The purport of it, as correctly expressed in 3 Bac. Abr. Extinguishment, D. 551 is, that "if a *stranger give bond for a simple contract debt due by another, this does not extinguish the simple contract debt; but if, upon making the contract, a stranger gives bond for it, or being present promises to give bond for it, and after does so, the debt by simple contract is extinguished, the obligation being made upon or pursuant to the contract." And the only question in this cause is, whether the obligation given by the ostensible partner for the price of the goods, has extinguished the implied joint contract of him and the dormant partner, created by law.

In the cases from Leonard, the bond was executed for a sole simple contract debt; and the doctrine is unquestionable, that the simple contract is thereby extinguished, whether the obligation be given by the debtor, or by a stranger who, by agreement of the parties, (though not otherwise) is substituted for the original debtor. The doctrine is founded in good reason; for the higher security furnishes a better remedy, and must have been intended as a substitute for the former remedy, and the debtor ought not to be harassed by a double action.

In the present case, the ostensible simple contract debt was the sole debt of the ostensible partner; and that was doubtless extinguished by the single bill given by him therefor. But the law, without the knowledge of the creditor, gave him (at his election so soon as discovered) a secret simple contract debt, upon the same consideration, due from the ostensible and dormant partners jointly; and the question is, whether that joint debt was extinguished by the separate obligation of the ostensible partner.

Where the partners of a firm are ostensible, I regard it as perfectly well settled that if a creditor accept the separate bond of one for a simple contract debt of the firm, the joint legal remedy is thereby destroyed: and in that sense the simple contract may be considered as 552 *extinguished. The cases of Clement v. Brush, 3 Johns. Cas. 180, and Tom v. Goodrich &c., 2 Johns. R. 213, cited for the plaintiff in error, prove nothing more than this; for they were both cases of ostensible partnership. This rule is sometimes illustrated by the analogy of a release by an obligee to one of several joint obligors, which operates as a release to all. But there is this distinction between the two cases: in the latter the entire debt is expressly relinquished, and therefore the operation of the release is the same, whether the obligation be joint only, or joint and several; whereas in the former, the debt being joint only, a several action cannot be maintained, and the joint remedy is gone by accepting the higher security from one of the joint debtors. The simple contract debt, however, in justice and good conscience is still due from both, though, being without a legal remedy, it is no longer recognized as existing at law. But it is not extinguished in equity, which allows or gives a remedy notwithstanding, and indeed for the very reason, that there is none at law. And this I take to be the principle of the cases cited in which this court, notwithstanding the execution of a bond by one of the partners for a partnership debt, gave relief in equity against the other partners; Sale v. Dishman's ex'ors, 3 Leigh 548; Galt's ex'ors v. Calland's ex'or, 7 Leigh 594; Weaver v. Tapscott, 9 Leigh 424. All of these, however, it will be found upon examination were cases of ostensible partnership.

In the case of ostensible partners, if the simple contract, instead of being joint only, (as it is at law, though not in equity, Story on Partn. p. 514, § 362,) were several, the separate bond of one of them would not extinguish the several remedy against the other. The simple contract would stand upon the same footing as a joint and several promissory note; and there it is clear that the several action would still remain against him who did not unite in the obligation, upon the same principle 553 *which governs the case of a joint and several bond, where a higher security is taken from one of the obligors, by acceptance or recovery of judgment against him only. Higgin's case, 6 Co. Rep. 45. It was there resolved, that "where two are bound jointly and severally, and the obligee has judgment against one of them, yet he may sue the other; for against him the nature of the bond is not changed, for notwithstanding the judgment he may still plead that it is not his deed." Now, in the case of a dormant partnership, the implied simple contract is not only joint, but several also as regards the ostensible partner; and it differs essentially from the case of an ostensible partnership in this, that in the latter the obligation is taken for the joint debt, which it extinguishes at law, but in the former it is taken for the separate debt only, extinguishing that, but leaving the remedy unimpaired upon the joint promise. It is true that the implied contract, after a several judgment upon it against the ostensible partner, can no longer be treated as joint. But this is equally true in regard to a joint and several bond, or a joint and several promissory note; and the reason, equally applicable to all, is to be found not so much in the nature of the debt as in the nature of the remedy, which may be prosecuted to a judgment either jointly or severally, but cannot be so prosecuted both jointly and severally. 1 Wms. Saund. 291 f.; Downey v. The Farmers and Mechanics Bank, 13 Serg. & Rawle 288; Williams &c. v. M'Fall &c., 2 Serg. & Rawle 280; 1 Ves. & Beam. 65.

I consider the case of Leslie v. Wilson, 7 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 395, an authority in point. There, goods conveyed by a ship having been spoiled in consequence of the negligence and unskilfulness of the captain, the freighter sued the owners, one of whom was the captain, for damages in an action on the case, and it was held that the action lay, though the captain had entered into a charter party under seal with 554 the freighter, by *which he engaged to convey the goods to their destination; it not appearing on the charter party that the captain was part-owner, nor that the freighter knew him to be such when the charter party was executed. All the owners were joined, and the case did not turn upon the vexed question whether the action was founded in tort or in contract, as presented whenever there is an omission of one or more of the joint contractors, it being a good objection in the latter, but not in the former. It seems however that the defendants' counsel, treating it, in another aspect, as founded in contract, contended that the implied contract on the part of the owners for the safe carriage of the goods was merged in the charter party under seal executed by one of them. But the court, after deciding that the execution of a charter party by the captain of a ship does not prevent the liability of the owners, waived as unnecessary the consideration of the doubtful proposition that the action was founded in contract, but upon that hypothesis overruled the objection of the part-ownership of the captain, on the ground that it was secret at the time he executed the charter party. The case therefore cannot be distinguished in principle from the one before us.

The able argument in this case has sought aid, on both sides, from authorities shewing the effect of a separate judgment against an ostensible partner, upon the right of action against his dormant partner; and these are worthy of consideration, inasmuch as they tend in some degree to elucidate, and rather more, it seems to me, to obscure, the principles belonging to the present subject.

In Sheehy v. Mandeville &c., 6 Cranch 253, the plaintiff Sheehy sold merchandise to Jameson, and took his sole promissory note therefor, on which he brought his action of debt and recovered judgment. Afterwards discovering that Mandeville was a dormant partner of Jameson at the time 555 of the transaction, he brought his *action of assumpsit against them both jointly. If the last action had been tried upon the general issue on an indebitatus assumpsit or quantum valebant for goods sold and delivered, and the separate note of the defendant Jameson had been relied upon as a bar, there can be no doubt that the plaintiff would have been entitled to a verdict. But the case was embarrassed by the nature of the pleadings. The declaration contained three counts: the first was founded upon the promissory note; the second was an indebitatus assumpsit for goods sold and delivered; and the third a quantum valebant for the same goods. The first count could not have been maintained, if it had set forth the case correctly; for it is clear that the note or bill of one partner, drawn by him individually, cannot be declared on as the note or bill of him and his copartner, though given to secure a debt for which the firm is liable, Chitty on Bills p. 433; Siffkin v. Walker &c., 2 Campb. 308; Emly v. Lye, 15 East 7; Ripley v. Kingsbury, 1 Day 150, note; unless under peculiar circumstances, when the individual name has been recognized by the partners as the name of the firm. Collyer on Partn. 227. And if the fact had appeared on the face of the declaration that the note was made by the defendant Jameson alone, that count would have been demurrable. But it did not so appear: on the contrary, it was averred that the note was made by both defendants under the name, firm and style of Robert B. Jameson, by which the defendants became liable, and being so liable, by that name and firm undertook &c. The defendant Mandeville appeared and filed two pleas. The first was to the whole declaration, and pleaded in bar the note of Jameson and the judgment thereupon, averring that the note was given by Jameson, and received by the plaintiff, in discharge of the plaintiff's bill for goods, wares and merchandise sold to Jameson, which were averred to be the same mentioned in the declaration. This plea was, on de-

556 murrer, *held bad as to the first count, because it did not deny the joint assumpsit laid in that count; but was sustained as to the two other counts, on the ground that though a note, without a special contract to that effect, would not of itself discharge the original cause of action, yet that by special agreement it may be received in payment, and such agreement was admitted by the demurrer. The second plea was to the first count only, and pleaded in bar to the joint action the separate judgment, upon the separate note of Jameson, in the former action brought against him alone, which note was averred to be the same mentioned in the declaration. And this plea was held bad on demurrer, on the ground that the original declaration not having been on a joint but a sole contract, the judgment did not bar the subsequent action on the joint contract. The court therefore gave judgment for the plaintiff on the first count of the declaration. Thus chief justice Marshall, who delivered the opinion of the court, made his way, through the perplexity of the pleadings, to the merits of the cause, but by a route necessarily circuitous and technical. The separate judgment on the separate note of the ostensible partner was held not to bar the joint action against him and the dormant partner. But that action ought to have been founded on the implied promise alone: and the plaintiff embarrassed his cause, by declaring, in the first count of his declaration, upon the separate note, which he was obliged to treat as a joint note, and by demurring to the defendant's first plea, instead of taking issue upon it, and thereby putting the defendant to the proof of the special agreement therein alleged.

In Willings & Francis v. Consequa, 1 Peters' C. C. R. 303, Kuhn was introduced as a witness on the part of the plaintiffs, and objected to by the defendant as incompetent by reason of his interest. It appeared that Kuhn and another, as the 557 agents of Willings & Francis, gave *a note to Consequa for merchandise purchased, in which Kuhn was interested. Consequa brought a suit against Willings & Francis on the note, stating it to be given by the procurement of their agents, Kuhn and another. It was agreed that whatever damages might be recovered in the suit of Willings & Francis against Consequa, in which the witness was offered, should be set off against the note. The ground of objection was that Kuhn, as a dormant partner of Willings & Francis, might be sued as such by Consequa at law, notwithstanding a recovery against Willings & Francis on the note, provided the note should not be discharged by a recovery of damages from Consequa, and Willings & Francis should be unable to pay it; and if not at law, he might be sued in equity; and therefore that he was interested in increasing the damages. Washington, J., overruled the objection to the competency of the witness, deciding that his interest was too remote, it depending upon several contingencies, and proceeded to remark: "If these contingencies should all happen, and Consequa should bring an action against Kuhn separately, he may be defeated by a plea of abatement; and the judgment in this action for or against Consequa would be a bar to any suit that he might bring against Willings & Francis and the witness. The judgment would as completely extinguish the original debt as if Willings & Francis had given a bond for it, which it would clearly have done, the rule that a bond given by a stranger is no extinguishment of the simple contract of the real debtor not applying to a case where it is given by one of two or more joint contractors." He then went on strongly to intimate, that after such a judgment of Consequa against Willings & Francis on the note, he could obtain no relief against Kuhn in equity; because of his wilfully proceeding to judgment against them alone. It will be seen that the judge's opinion of the effect of a separate judgment against Willings & Francis is upon 558 *the supposition that Kuhn, having been discovered to be a dormant partner, might be united with them in an action upon the note; and upon that supposition it is clearly correct, as much so as if, after such discovery, Consequa had taken their separate obligation for the debt. But the authorities already cited on that point establish that Kuhn could not be sued upon the note, not being a party thereto; and of course it could not be the case of a separate judgment against part only of several joint contractors, in an action upon the joint contract. The effect of the judgment upon a subsequent joint action on the implied contract was not considered at all; and in truth the whole of what was said by the judge, after deciding that the interest of the witness was too remote to render him incompetent, was mere matter of superfluous argument.

Penny v. Martin, 4 Johns. Ch. R. 566, is an authority upon the question of relief in equity after a several judgment on the joint implied contract. The judgment was rendered in an action of assumpsit against two partners for goods sold, and the bill filed against them and three others as dormant partners since discovered. The bill was dismissed on demurrer, for want of jurisdiction; the chancellor, without deciding whether the plaintiffs had lost their remedy at law, being of opinion that their ignorance, at the time of the judgment, of the fact alleged to have been since discovered, was not a sufficient ground for transferring to that court jurisdiction of a matter properly, if not exclusively, cognizable at law; no accident, mistake or fraud being shewn.

Ward v. Johnson &c., 13 Mass. Rep. 148, is an authority upon the effect of a several judgment on the express joint contract, upon a subsequent action against all the partners on the same contract. An action of assumpsit was brought and judgment rendered against one of two partners alone, on a promissory note given by him in the name of the firm. A subsequent action of assumpsit was brought against the two partners on the same note, and they pleaded the former recovery, which was held to be a bar. The court said, that by the judgment in the first action the contract was merged, and the form of action changed, a higher security for the debt being substituted, in like manner as a bond for a debt due upon simple contract operates as an extinguishment; and that there was no instance of two judgments for the same cause of action.

Robertson v. Smith &c., 18 Johns. R. 459, was an action of assumpsit against the defendants on a promissory note made by Soulden, Smith & co. The plaintiff had previously recovered judgment on the note against Peter Sken Smith and William Soulden, the ostensible partners, under the firm of Soulden, Smith & co. In his declaration in the first suit, he averred them to be partners in trade, and that the note was made by them in their partnership name and firm. Not having obtained satisfaction of the judgment, and supposing that Peter

Smith and Abraham Van Santvoord were also partners under the same firm, he brought suit against the four defendants. And it was held that the former judgment against two of the defendants on the note was a bar to the subsequent action against the four defendants for the same cause of action. This was the case of a separate judgment against the ostensible partners upon an express contract, the terms of which embraced the dormant partners, and a subsequent action against all upon the same joint contract. The reasoning and authorities adduced by Spencer, C. J., who delivered the opinion of the court, are entirely satisfactory to shew that the former recovery was a bar to the subsequent action. But he seems to have misapprehended the case of Sheehy v. Mandeville &c. in expressing his disapproval of the opinion delivered by chief justice Marshall. The separate judgment in that case was not, as he supposes, upon a joint, but a separate contract. Both declarations, it is true, were upon the same note, but the first treated it as a separate promise (as it was in point of fact) and the last as a joint promise; and the court, being warranted by the structure of the declaration in the last case in regarding it, in that action, as a joint promise, held that the first recovery on the separate promise was no bar to the second action on the joint promise. The result would have been the same, as I have already shewn, if the case had been properly presented by the pleadings; and the decision was doubtless according to the truth and justice of the cause.

In Smith v. Black, 9 Serg. & Rawle 142, Black sold goods to Nathan Smith, and took his note therefor, upon which he recovered judgment. Afterwards discovering Newberry Smith to be a dormant partner, he brought his action against both. The first count was on the promissory note: the second and third counts were for goods sold. It was held that the separate judgment was a bar to the second action: and the decision was, by agreement, made upon the merits of the cause, without regard to the pleadings. Duncan, J., delivered the opinion of the court. He evidently treats the second action as founded upon the promissory note, and that note as evidencing a joint promise. He pays no regard to the effect of the separate security in authorizing and requiring the action thereupon to be several; and gives no thought to the implied joint contract raised by law, that broad basis of the recovery against a dormant partner. And he misapprehends the decision of the supreme court in Sheehy v. Mandeville, stating it from the erroneous marginal note of the reporter to be, "that a several suit and several judgments against one of two makers of a promissory note is no bar to a joint action against both." He reasons however very forcibly and satisfactorily to shew, that the merger occasioned by a judgment upon the joint promise cannot be obviated by the plaintiff's ignorance, at the time, of the 561 dormant partnership, *and places in a strong light the inconveniences which would flow from a contrary doctrine.

It seems to me that there is nothing in the cases, thus examined, to justify the idea that the several security of the ostensible partner is to be regarded as the joint contract of the firm, which is at war with the well established doctrine on the subject; and that a want of attention to that doctrine is the source of the misapprehensions I have noticed of chief justice Marshall's opinion in Sheehy v. Mandeville &c. and of the difficulties which arose in that case. Much less is there any thing in those cases to warrant the inference, that the liability of the dormant partner is destroyed by the separate security of the ostensible partner. In truth they proceed upon the opposite idea, of their joint liability, and the merger thereof by a separate judgment upon the joint contract. And if I have succeeded in shewing that the separate simple contract security of the ostensible partner ought to be regarded as collateral to the joint implied contract of the firm, there is still more reason for so considering his separate specialty security; for the former may, under very special circumstances, be treated as the security of the partnership, but the latter in no case whatever.

The foregoing views, if correct, attain the substantial merits of the cause, and preserve in its true spirit and policy the liability of dormant partners; and are not opposed by even technical obstacles, those stumbling-blocks in the path of justice, chiefly worthy of regard in order that they may be shunned. I think there is no error in the judgment of the circuit court.

STANARD, J. The acuteness and ability with which this case was argued required the most careful and deliberate investigation of it. Such an investigation I have endeavoured to make, and now proceed to state the results.

562 *The plaintiff in error insists on two general propositions: 1st. That as the specialty for the price of the goods was given by Fisher at the time of the purchase, that was the only duty or responsibility incurred, and as that did not charge a partner, whether ostensible or dormant, there was not only no contract on which such partner could be charged, but the contract that was confessedly made was utterly incompatible with a partnership responsibility. 2dly, That if on the purchase an assumpsit had been made, so as to create a simple contract debt for the goods, for which a dormant partner might be made responsible had the responsibility remained unchanged, the specialty given by Fisher the ostensible debtor and accepted by the creditor extinguished the simple contract debt, and discharged at law the other partner, whether known or dormant, from responsibility on the assumpsit. If either of these propositions be sustained, the judgment of the court below must be reversed.

The special verdict finds that the specialty was given for the payment of the price at the time the goods were sold and delivered. The purchase and the obligation by specialty to pay the price were cotemporary,—uno flatu; and it is plausibly, and I incline to think justly said, that the consummated contract for the purchase on the part of the purchaser was by specialty, on the giving of which, and not until then, his title to the goods and his obligation to pay became complete, so that at no time was the ostensible partner responsible in assumpsit, and consequently there was no contract preexisting the specialty on which a partner known or dormant could be sued. But as this view of the case is liable to be encountered by a criticism on the terms of the special verdict, and that criticism may involve in some doubt the interpretation of the verdict in this regard, I forbear to give a definitive opinion on this, and proceed to the consideration of the second question.

563 *The counsel of the defendant in error have, with much learning and ingenuity, endeavoured to maintain, that where several are bound jointly by simple contract, the merger or extinguishment of such contract by a higher security, as by specialty or judgment, does not take place as a necessary legal consequence, unless all bound by the simple contract be bound by the higher security; and that where such higher security is given by a part of those bound by the simple contract, such higher security does not merge or extinguish the simple contract, but operates its discharge by way of satisfaction, if given and accepted as such. The conclusion from these propositions to the case in judgment is, that the specialty of the one did not in law extinguish the assumpsit of both, and could not be considered as accepted in satisfaction of the then unknown responsibility of the dormant partner.

It is our province to enquire into and declare what the law is, not to speculate and reason and decide on what it ought to be. The law, on its own reason, has provided that where two or more are jointly bound by contract, the legal remedy must be pursued against all; and one or more of several jointly bound has the right to intercept judgment in a suit pretermittting others. A kindred principle is, that if, by act of the claimant in such joint contract, one or more of the parties jointly bound be discharged, so that all cannot be subjected to a joint judgment, none are liable to judgment on the joint contract; in other words, all are discharged from the legal remedy on the joint contract. Unity of action and unity of responsibility on the same contract must be coexisting, and the destruction of the one is the destruction of the other. Hence a release of one of several jointly bound operates a discharge of all, and this too though no such discharge was intended. The immediate corollary from this principle is, that unless the creditor who may have taken the specialty of, 564 or prosecuted *his claim to judgment against, one of two joint debtors by simple contract, retains, notwithstanding, the legal right to sue on the original joint contract all the parties therein, including the one from whom he may have taken the specialty or against whom he may have obtained judgment, the original joint simple contract is, as a necessary legal consequence, discharged at law.

This being premised, I proceed to enquire whether the position taken by the defendant in error be sustained by authority. The passage cited from 3 Bac. Abr. 106, 7, does not support the broad proposition that a merger or extinguishment of a simple contract is not produced by a specialty, unless all jointly bound by the simple contract be also bound by the specialty. The case from 1 Mason 482, proceeds on the ground that a debt by statute was not merged in the specialty of a third person not bound for the debt, and would not have been merged, as would a simple contract debt, in the specialty of the debtor himself. The case of Sheehy v. Mandeville &c., 6 Cranch 253, will be the subject of future notice.

The cases hostile to the position of the counsel for the defendant in error are numerous, and in my estimation decisive.

Among the cases shewing that according to the principles of the common law a judgment obtained by the creditor on the joint contract, against one or more of the parties bound by it, merges or extinguishes the joint contract, as well in respect to the other parties originally bound by it, as in respect to the parties against whom the judgment may have been rendered, I refer to Robertson v. Smith &c., 18 Johns. R. 459. In that case a judgment had been obtained against two partners. Other partners, then unknown, were afterwards discovered, and suit was renewed on the original contract against them. To 565 this the plea of the former *judgment against the two was held to be a bar. In passing, it may be remarked that in the very able argument of the plaintiff's counsel in that case, he felt himself constrained to admit, that had the creditor taken the specialty of the two, instead of prosecuting the claim to judgment against them, such specialty would have extinguished the simple contract as to all.

I also refer to the following cases:

Ward v. Johnson &c., 13 Mass. Rep. 148. Henry Johnson gave a promissory note to the plaintiff, on which judgment was rendered against him. It was afterwards discovered that Thomas Johnson was a dormant partner, and the suit was renewed on the note against both. The judgment against Henry Johnson was pleaded in bar, and the plea was sustained.

Smith v. Black, 9 Serg. & Rawle 142, almost identical with Ward v. Johnson &c. in circumstances and result.

In the case of Willings & Francis v. Consequa, 1 Peters' C. C. R. 301, the doctrine in respect to the legal effect of a judgment against an ostensible, on the liability of a dormant partner, is thus laid down: Should the creditor, after the judgment against the ostensible partner, bring suit against K. (the dormant partner) separately, he may be defeated by plea in abatement; and the judgment in this action (against the ostensible partner) would be a bar to any suit he might bring against Willings & Francis and K. The judgment would have as completely extinguished the original debt as to Willings & Francis, as if they had given a bond for it, which it would clearly have done; the rule that a bond given by a stranger is no extinguishment of a simple contract of the real debtor, not applying to a case where it is given by one of two or more joint contractors.

Drake v. Mitchell &c., 3 East 251. In that case one of several joint covenantors gave a bill of exchange, which, however, was not taken in satisfaction. The 566 *bill being dishonoured, suit was brought on it, and judgment therein recovered against the drawer.

A suit was afterwards brought on the joint covenant, to which the judgment on the bill was pleaded in bar. This plea was disallowed, on the principle that it being a judgment on the bill, though the bill was merged in the judgment, the covenant was left intact. The bill did not operate an extinguishment of the covenant as to the drawer or the other covenantors, and the judgment on it, without satisfaction, in no wise affected the covenant. It is however conceded in that case, that had the judgment been on the covenant, the legal remedy on the covenant as to the party against whom it was rendered, and consequently as to the other joint covenantors, would have been extinguished.

It may here be remarked, that in each of the cases from Johnson's and Serg. & Rawle's reports, the case of Sheehy v. Mandeville &c. was cited and commented on by the court. It was not deemed an authority governing those cases. And in the judgment of the court in the case of Ward v. Johnson &c. it is said, that in Sheehy v. Mandeville &c. "it is admitted or strongly intimated that the facts disclosed in that case were sufficient, had they been properly pleaded, to bar the action against Jameson." A reference to the case itself will shew that there was warrant for the comments made on it by the courts of New York and Massachusetts; and in the complexity caused by the state of the pleadings, the general question now under consideration was not distinctly presented, argued or adjudicated. This is further evinced by the fact that judge Washington, who was one of the court concurring in the decision of Sheehy v. Mandeville &c. gave the judgment cited from 1 Peters' C. C. R. Willings & Francis v. Consequa.

While in the foregoing cases the effect of a judgment against one of several joint contractors, on the legal responsibility of the others upon the original contract. 567 *was the subject of controversy and decision, it was in some of them conceded, as free from reasonable doubt, that the specialty given by and accepted from one would in law extinguish the simple contract as to all: and those cases therefore conclude a fortiori as to the law governing the latter case.

But the adjudications on the latter case are numerous and unvarying. Opinions to this effect are distinctly expressed by this court in its judgments in the cases of Sale v. Dishman's ex'ors, 3 Leigh 548; Galt's ex'ors v. Calland's ex'or, 7 Leigh 594, and Weaver v. Tapscott, 9 Leigh 424; and though it was justly remarked at the bar that in the first and last of these cases a decision of that question was not indispensable, yet in the case of Galt's ex'ors v. Calland's ex'or the court considered that as a material question, and adjudged it as one important to the decision of the case. That adjudication, not in conflict with any that the diligence and learning of the counsel for the defendant in error has discovered, is supported by those before referred to, and more precisely by Clement v. Brush, 3 Johns. Cas. 180, and Tom v. Goodrich &c., 2 Johns. R. 213.

The decision of judge Story in 1 Mason 482, conflicts with that of Tom v. Goodrich &c. on the point whether a bond for duties would merge the debt created by statute, but it does not conflict with the proposition of law on which the judgment in the case of Tom v. Goodrich &c. rests, to wit, that the specialty of one of two joint debtors by simple contract, in point of law extinguishes the simple contract.

It is urged, however, that the case of a dormant partner is distinguishable from that of an ostensible one, and that such a partner cannot be discharged from legal liability for the debts of the partnership, by the transactions of the creditor with the ostensible partner, in ignorance of the fact of partnership. In support of 568 *this proposition, the case of Leslie v. Wilson, 7 Eng. C. L. R. 395, reported also in 6 J. B. Moore 415, is cited. That case is inapplicable, because it was an action of tort. One of the parties had signed a charter party under seal; but that, it was adjudged, did not protect the other from the action. The case proceeds on the grounds that the action for the tort was independent of that on the contract, and was not merged in the specialty; and upon the principles of that case, the action for the tort might have been sustained, though all the partners had signed the charter party.

The case of Robinson v. Wilkinson, 3 Price 538, 1 Eng. Exch. R. 417, appears, on a cursory view of the general expression of chief baron Richards, more applicable and stringent. But on examination it is found that the dealings with the ostensible partner, in virtue of which the dormant partner claimed to be discharged, were of such a nature that the creditor was left at liberty to resort to the original contract, even against the ostensible partner. Those dealings had neither extinguished nor satisfied the original demand as to the ostensible partner, had he only been liable for it; and on that ground only was the action against the dormant partner sustained. Graham, baron, says, "The debt against Cay" (the ostensible partner) "remained undischarged, and the plaintiff had a right to resort to his original remedy, which was then revived against all persons primarily liable." Wood, baron, says, "The drawing of the bill which was afterwards dishonoured is no discharge. If Cay had been discharged, the defendant as his partner would have been discharged, but that was not so here." The remark of Richards, chief baron, that "a dormant partner cannot discharge himself from liability to pay the debts of a creditor through the medium of his ostensible partner, by any acts of his during the concealment of the unknown partner," is to be limited in its gen-

569 erality to the case in *judgment. Beyond the case the judge is not to be understood as intending to extend his remark; and if he did so intend, it is to that extent extrajudicial and no adjudication.

On the whole case my opinion is, that the giving and acceptance of the specialty of Fisher mentioned in the verdict extinguished the simple contract, and thereafter the creditor had no legal remedy on that simple contract against Fisher and his partner, whether ostensible or dormant, or against either of them; and that the law arising on the verdict is for the plaintiff in error.

ALLEN, J., concurring in the opinion of Stanard, J., the judgment of the circuit court was reversed with costs, and judgment entered on the special verdict for the defendant.

570 *Savage and Others v. Mears and Wife.

December, 1848, Richmond.

(Absent CABELL, P., and STANARD,* J.)

Will—Pretermitted Child—Revocation—Case at Bar.—

A testator having six children, four the issue of a deceased wife, and two the issue of his present wife, devises to his two sons each a tract of land described by metes and bounds, directs that all his other lands shall be equally divided among his four daughters and their heirs, and then devises and bequeaths as follows: "My will is that my negroes be apportioned equally amongst my six children, under the following regulation, to say, that the one third thereof which shall be allotted to my wife as her dower shall be the full part of the two children I had by her, and also that the several negroes I have from time to time furnished any of my children be their right, but that they shall be each appraised and accounted for in their part of the division of my slaves. Lastly, I desire that all the residue of my estate not before specifically given be equally divided amongst my aforesaid six children." The will is made the 81st of December 1792, and the testator dies in 1794, prior to the 28th of October; between which periods, to wit in November 1793, a third child of the testator by his second wife is born. HELD, 1. According to the authority of Yerby v. Yerby, 3 Call 324, the birth of such third child was not a revocation of the will. 2. As the will was published, and the testator died, before the passage of the act of 1794 providing for pretermitted children, the case does not fall within the operation of that statute. 3. Upon the true construction of the will, the afterborn child has no claim to share in the division of the dower slaves after the death of the widow.

*He had been counsel for the appellants.

Ralph Justice of Accomac county died in the year 1794, prior to the 28th of October, having duly made and published his last will and testament, bearing date the 31st of December 1792, whereby, after giving to his wife some personal chattels in addition to the dower which the law entitled her to, and to his two sons each 571 *a tract of land described by metes and bounds, and directing that all his other lands should be equally divided among his four daughters and their heirs, he further devised and bequeathed as follows:

"Fifthly. My will is that my negroes be apportioned equally amongst my six children, under the following regulation, to say, the one third thereof which shall be allotted to my wife as her dower shall be the full part of the two children I had by her, and also that the several negroes I have from time to time furnished any of my children be their right, but that they shall be each appraised and accounted for in their part of the division of my slaves.

"Lastly. I desire that all the residue of my estate not before specifically given be equally divided amongst my aforesaid six children."

Four of the testator's children were the issue of a former marriage. At the time of making his will, he had only two children by his second wife, namely, James and Elizabeth: but afterwards, and in the lifetime of the testator, to wit in November 1793, a third child, Catharine by name, was born.

The will was proved and recorded in Accomac county court on the 28th of October 1794. The widow of the testator died in the year 1833; whereupon James Justice and John Savage (who had intermarried with Elizabeth Justice) took possession of the whole of the dower slaves, about 30 in number, and divided them between themselves, in exclusion of Catharine, who was now married to Thomas Mears.

In February 1834, Mears and wife exhibited a bill in the circuit superior court of Accomac against James Justice and John Savage and wife, setting forth the will of the testator, and the facts above stated; charging that the defendants had refused to allow the plaintiffs any share of the dower slaves; and praying that one third of the said slaves, and of their hires and 572 profits *since the death of the widow, might be decreed to the plaintiffs.

The defendants answered, admitting all the facts set forth in the bill, but nevertheless insisting that the plaintiffs had no manner of interest in or title to the said slaves, because the law by which a child under circumstances similar to those of the female plaintiff would now be entitled to a share of his or her father's estate, was not enacted till the 5th of December 1794, some time after the death of Ralph Justice the testator, and had no application to cases existing before its passage.

The court directed an account, shewing the number, ages, names and respective values of the dower slaves which had come to the possession of the defendants, and the amount for which the said slaves would reasonably have hired since the death of the widow. This account being taken, the court decreed that the plaintiffs recover against the defendants 76 dollars 17 cents, being one third of the net hires for the year 1834; and appointed special commissioners to divide the slaves into three equal parts, and to assign one of those parts by name to the plaintiffs. Such division and assignment being accordingly made and reported by the commissioners, the court, on the 9th of April 1835, pronounced a decree, that the plaintiffs hold the slaves so assigned them, and that the division made by the said commissioners be forever held firm and stable between the parties.

On the petition of the defendants, an appeal was allowed.

Lyons for appellants. The female plaintiff had no right at all under the statute of December 5, 1794, 1 Old Rev. Code p. 319, 20, ch. 170, § 1, for that statute was passed subsequent to the execution of the will and to the death of the testator. And the statute of December 13, 1792, 1 Old 573 Rev. Code p. 160, 61, ch. 92, *§ 3, providing for children born after the execution of a will made when the testator was childless, and for posthumous children, has no application to this case. In Yerby v. Yerby, 3 Call 334, it was decided that prior to the statute of 1794, even a second marriage and the birth of children would be no revocation of a will disposing of the testator's estate among the issue of his first marriage. As to the circumstances which amount to an implied revocation of a will, see the case of Wilcox v. Rootes & others, 1 Wash. 140, and 1 Williams on Ex'ors 96.

G. N. Johnson for appellees. This case turns mainly on the proper construction of the will.

A will, in respect to the personal estate of the testator, speaks at the time of his death; and particularly where the question is as to the persons who are to take, and those persons are children. Thus where a legacy of 50 pounds each was given "to the children that Joseph Ringrose hath," all the children living at the death of the testator were held entitled. Ringrose v. Bramham, 2 Cox's C. R. 384. And numerous cases are to be found deciding that the children born after the death of the testator are to be excluded under the terms of such a provision. In Matchwick v. Cock, 3 Ves. 609, a case decided by the court of king's bench is stated, in which that court is said to have gone very far in construing the intention of the testator to embrace children born after the making of the will and before his death, even where the terms of the will would seem almost necessarily to exclude them: so far, that the vicechancellor seems to have considered it an extreme case. To these may be added the case of Viner v. Francis, 2 Bro. C. C. 658; 2 Cox's C. R. 190.

Here the slaves to be allotted to the wife for her distributive share are given to the two children the testator had by her. If the will speaks at the death of the 574 *testator, he had at that time three children; and there is obviously no intention to disinherit any child of his second wife. Which two of the children shall be selected as the legatees?

The main purpose of the testator was to give to the children of his then wife the remainder of the slaves given to her for life: the reference to them as his two children was merely used as an incidental description of them as they existed at that time, without any purpose to restrict his bounty to those two, in case there should afterwards be an increase of the number. He was evidently making provision for his children in classes; for those of the first marriage in one class, and for those of the second in another. If the use of the word two be held an inaccuracy merely,—a mistake of description, inadvertently employed as correct at the time and embracing then the whole class of beneficiaries, without attention on the part of the testator to the circumstance that it might at a future day be inapplicable to the beneficiaries as a class, the court will, in order to effectuate the general intent, reject that part of the description which is inaccurate, and thus correct the mistake. Bradwin v. Harpur, Ambl. 374, and Smith v. Campbell, 19 Ves. 400, are strong cases of this sort. If the testator, after the birth of the third child, had been asked whether he had provided for the children of his second wife by his will, there can be scarcely a doubt that he would have answered in the affirmative. [Brooke, J. There can be little doubt he would have said that his intention was to provide for them all by his will: but in a case before lord Mansfield, cited by me in Boisseaus v. Aldridges, 5 Leigh 239, it was said of the testator, quod voluit non dixit; and the question is whether that remark is not applicable here.]

If the court should differ with me on this point, I refer to our statutory provisions on the subject, as shewing the legislative intent that no child of a decedent, 575 *born after the making of his will, should in any case be disinherited, if merely pretermitted and unnoticed by the will. Judging of the legislative intent by the reason and spirit of the enactment in the 3d section of the act of 1785, (1 R. C. of 1819, p. 376, ch. 104, § 3,) and by the construction of that intent given in the subsequent act of 1794, and not merely by the precise scope of the words employed, the case of an afterborn child, situated like the female plaintiff here, was fairly and properly embraced. In Yerby v. Yerby, the will had given the whole property to the children of the first marriage, without any reference at all to a second marriage, the testator being married to his second wife after the execution of the will. Here there is a provision for children of the second marriage.

C. Johnson on the same side. Our statutes have proceeded step by step in making provision for children pretermitted by the will of the father. These successive amendments shew the spirit by which the legislature was actuated in relation to this subject. And we invoke that spirit as the appropriate one in which to consider the main question in this case—that of the construction of the clause by which the testator has expressed his intentions concerning the issue of his second marriage.

In Sherer v. Bishop, 4 Bro. C. C. 55, 60, (which will doubtless be relied upon on the other side) the testator bequeathed legacies to the six children of John and Mary Sherer, and it was held that an afterborn child of those parties was excluded. There the testator was providing, not for his own children, but for those of other persons; he was fulfilling no natural duty, but exercising his legal and natural right to dispose at his own pleasure of that which was his; and in doing so, he selected as the objects of his bounty the children who were then 576 *already acquainted, not contemplating other issue of the same parties, in existence, and with whom he was in excluding which he would be chargeable with no dereliction of natural duty. But where the provision is made by a father for his children, every presumption militates against the conclusion that he designed his bounty to be confined to those existing at the date of the will, in exclusion of others who might subsequently come into existence, occupying the same relation to himself with the former, and equally calling upon his natural duty to provide for them. And it is a principle established by many cases in the english courts, that the will is to be construed in every way it can, for the purpose of embracing the afterborn children, and acquitting the testator of a violation of his natural duty to provide for his own offspring, each and all, when no reason exists or can be imagined for any discrimination among them. This is strongly shewn in the cases already cited on behalf of the appellees.

Stanard in reply. The question mainly argued on the other side is in substance this—Whether Ralph Justice shall be permitted to make a will for himself, or the court will undertake to make one for him? Though the court must construe the will according to the intention of the testator, yet where the words are plain, they must be taken as the sole evidence and explanation of his intention. Now is there, upon the face of this will, any ground whatever to support the construction contended for on the other side—namely, that the testator's intent was to provide for his children in classes? The testator's clear intent was to provide for all his six children equally, by dividing his slaves equally among them. [C. Johnson. He charged the whole dower interest of the wife upon the third of the slaves which are given to her children. He could not therefore mean to place the six children on an equality in the division 577 *of the slaves.] The main and obvious intent still was to make the shares equal, merely postponing the enjoyment of the shares given to the two children of the second marriage, until their mother's death. By bringing in the third child to share with the two elder, the effect of the construction contended for would be to increase the inequality already created by the charge of the wife's dower interest.

In Viner v. Francis, 2 Bro. C. C. 658, 2 Cox's C. R. 190, (cited for the appellants) the opinion of the master of the rolls was, that if the testator had bequeathed to the three children of his late sister, instead of bequeathing to the children of his late sister (as he actually did) the death of one of the three would have caused a lapse of his interest in the legacy, because the children would in such case have been personæ designatæ. The case supposed by the judge is our case; and his opinion on it is an authority directly in our favour. And in Matchwick v. Cock, 3 Ves. 609, the master of the rolls expressed the opinion, that if the testator has given his property to the children then in existence, forgetting and omitting those which might afterwards come into being, the court, however much disposed to do so, cannot supply the omission. If we had made the most diligent search for a judicial opinion expressly in our favour, we could have found none more so than the opinion in this case. And see 1 Roper on Legacies 46, where the principle on this subject is stated in accordance with that opinion.

The child claiming here is not a posthumous child; if the testator wished and intended to provide for her, it was completely in his power to do so by an alteration of his will. Having failed to do that, how can the court undertake to say that he meant to provide for her, or supposed he had already done so; or even that he had not good reasons for omitting all provision for her? The will was made on the 578 last day of 1792, and this *child was born in 1793. The testator was bound to know the provisions of his will, and it cannot be supposed that he had forgotten them, when the execution of the will took place so recently before.

The case of Sherer v. Bishop has been referred to by Mr. Johnson, and he admits that the only distinction between that case and ours is, that the testator there was not providing for his own children; if the legatees had been his own children, it is conceded that the case would in every particular have been full and direct authority in our favour. As to Smith v. Campbell, 19 Ves. 400, it appears from the abstract of that case given by Roper, (1 Roper on Legacies 135,) that Sir William Grant founded his opinion expressly on the ground that the testator, in using the terms "my next of kin in Ireland," did not employ the last two words as descriptive of the persons who were to take, but merely as a reference to the place in which he supposed his next of kin to reside. The case is no example of rejecting part of a description.

It is contended for the appellants, on the authority of Ringrose v. Bramham, 2 Cox's C. R. 384, that the words "the two children I had by my present wife" are to be regarded as spoken at the testator's death, at which time he had three children, and so, unless all the three are embraced by the bequest, there will be an ambiguity as to which two of them are to take, and therefore the provision will be void for uncertainty. This is an extraordinary proposition—that a will, perfectly unambiguous at the time of its execution, may be made ambiguous by extrinsic circumstances occurring between that period and the testator's death. The principle that a will is to be considered as speaking at the death of the testator has reference merely to the subject,—the property on which the will is to operate; and even in that sense, its application is confined to after in which a will can be *made to speak at the death of the testator, to any other purpose, is by a republication; and this whether it be a devise of land or a testament of chattels. Wind v. Jekyl, 1 P. Wms. 575; 1 Lomax on Ex'ors 65, and cases there cited.

The case of Ringrose v. Bramham, so far from being an authority to support the general proposition that a will is to be considered as speaking at the testator's death, distinctly shews that the master of the rolls recognized no such principle. He resorted to construction for the purpose of letting in the afterborn children; but if the will spoke at the death of the testator, there could have been no necessity for reasoning or construction, since the words used to designate the legatees, if regarded as spoken at the death of the testator, would necessarily include all the children of J. Ringrose living at that time. The construction employed in that case, which made the words "every child that J. Ringrose hath" equivalent to "every child that J. Ringrose shall have at the time when the legacies shall vest," was not only far less violent than that which is contended for here, but was countenanced by the testator's own use of the present tense in another clause, where the word come was evidently employed and necessarily to be construed in the sense of shall come.

As to the cases in which a legacy is given to a class of persons, (children, for example) the principle on which they rest is clearly stated in 1 Roper on Legacies p. 48. Those cases stand upon distinct ground, and have no application to this.

It is impossible to conceive a case more exactly falling within the scope and terms of the act of 1794, than the case here. Yet if the argument urged on the other side as to the construction of the will be sound, the female plaintiff could not have claimed under that statute as a pretermitted child, though the statute had been enacted before the death of her father and before the execution of his will.

She could not claim both under the will and against it,—both as provided for by the will, and as pretermitted. Suppose, in that case, she had brought her suit under the statute, claiming as a child of this testator born after the execution of the will, and pretermitted by it; and that her claim had been resisted on the ground of the construction here contended for: with what temper would the court have listened to the argument which is now urged?

The case of Yerby v. Yerby is a full and direct answer to all the considerations urged for regarding this case as embraced by the spirit or equity of the statute of 1785.

It was also objected for the appellants, that the decree was wrong in the manner of making provision for the plaintiffs. But it is unnecessary to report the argument on that point.

ALLEN, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The court is of opinion, that according to the authority of Yerby v. Yerby, 3 Call 334, the subsequent birth of the child in this case was not a revocation of the will, and as the will was published, and the testator died, before the passage of the act of 1794 providing for the case of pretermitted children, this case does not fall within the operation of that statute. The court is further of opinion, that upon the true construction of the will there is nothing from which an intention can be gathered to provide for the children in classes. That the general intent of the testator was to give to each of his six children then living an equal proportion of the slaves, but that the time for enjoyment was postponed, as to the two children by the second wife, by giving them the third which should be allotted to the wife as her dower. That in this case the children in existence at the date of the will precisely answered the description given, as to number and the mode in which the property was to be distributed amongst them, and that the expression of the will is equivalent to a description of the six children by name. That if the testator had survived the passage of the act of 1794, and died without altering his will, the pretermitted child would have had a clear right to call upon all of the devisees and legatees to contribute, and it would not have been in the power of the four children by the first marriage to repel such claim, upon the ground now set up, that the will had made provision for her; and the fact of the testator's dying before the said act was passed cannot change the construction of the will. The court is therefore of opinion that the decree is erroneous, and that the circuit court, instead of making such decree, ought to have dismissed the bill with costs.

Decree reversed and bill dismissed.

582 *Farneyhough's Ex'ors v. Dickerson &c.

December, 1843, Richmond.

(Absent CABELL, P.)

Supersedeas—Executorial Account—Admission to Record.—An executorial account being settled by commissioners under an order of the court of probate, some of the legatees file exceptions to the account, and the court overrules the same, orders the account to be recorded, and adjudges the exceptors to pay the executor's costs. HELD, this is a final proceeding or order, within the meaning of the act in Sess. Acts of 1830-31, ch. 11, § 20, p. 50; Suppl. to Rev. Code p. 145, to which, on the petition of the exceptors, a supersedeas may be awarded. Accord. Triplett's ex'ors v. Jamieson, 2 Munf. 242.

Executors and Administrators—Commissions.—As a general rule, an executor is not entitled to commission on the amount of debt due from him to the testator, and credited to the estate in the executorial account. Accord. Carter's ex'ors v. Cutting and wife, 5 Munf. 227.

Same—Same.—The commission of an executor should not be on the amount of his disbursements. He ought generally to be allowed a commission on the amount of the credits in his account, except on a credit for a debt due from him to the testator. Though some of the credits are for bonds due the estate, that were passed over by the executor to legatees, and voluntarily received by the latter, commissions will nevertheless be allowed the executor on the amount of such bonds.

Same—Charges for Clerk's Hire.—An item of $21, paid by executors for services rendered by a clerk, being allowed by commissioners, the same was excepted to by legatees, upon the ground that what the clerk did ought to have been done by the executors, and therefore that he should be paid out of their commissions. The record contained no evidence on the subject, except that the date of the item was a few days after the date of a large credit for sales at public auction, which

*Executors and Administrators—Commissions.—See foot-note to Claycomb v. Claycomb, 10 Gratt. 589. The principal case is cited in Buxton v. Shaffer, 43 W. Va. 296, 27 S. E. Rep. 820; Claycomb v. Claycomb, 10 Gratt. 592; Gregory v. Parker, 87 Va. 451, 12 S. E. Rep. 801. See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 6 Gratt. 6.

furnished some ground for the inference that the clerk was employed during those sales. HOLD, the court of probate did not err in overruling the exception.

On the application of Nimrod Branham and Edward Farneyhough junior, executors of Edward Farneyhough senior deceased, the court of Albemarle county, at 583 August *term 1832, appointed commissioners to settle the accounts of the said executorship. The accounts were accordingly settled from January 1832, when the executorship commenced, to July 1832, and a report returned, to which there were seven exceptions filed by legatees.

The second exception was to an item of 21 dollars "paid B. Townley for services as clerk." It was excepted to upon the ground that if the executors thought proper to engage the services of a clerk to perform labour which they should themselves have performed, he should be paid out of their legal commissions. The date of this item was the 31st of January 1832; the credit for sales at public auction bore date on the 23d of that month; and the amount of those sales was 14695 dollars 51 cents.

The credits to the estate being 23813 dollars 51 cents, and the disbursements 22177 dollars 70½ cents, a commission of 5 per cent. on the disbursements was allowed, amounting to 1108 dollars 88 cents, and the said disbursements and commissions being deducted, a balance was reported in the executors' hands of 526 dollars 92½ cents. One of the credits was "Nimrod Branham's note, 1123 dollars 47 cents." And the third exception was because the executors were allowed a commission of 5 per cent. on this debt, and it was deemed illegal and unjust that an executor should be allowed a commission for paying his own debt.

Among the sums credited as received by the executors, were credits on account of notes assigned to Douglass Dickerson and Thomas Birkhead, two of the legatees. By statements subjoined to the report, it appeared that the amount of notes assigned to Dickerson was 2029 dollars 19 cents, and that the amount of notes assigned to Birkhead was 2687 dollars 34 cents. The fourth exception was because the commissioners 584 allowed the executors 5 per cent. commission on the *amount of notes so assigned to the said Dickerson and Birkhead. The notes, it was stated in the exception, were in part in possession of the testator at the time of his death, and in part for property sold by the executors, and were assigned, at the instance and request of the said executors, to the legatees, who assumed the trouble, expense and responsibility of collecting the same.

The county court overruled the exceptions to the report, ordered the said report to be recorded, and adjudged the legatees who filed the exceptions to pay the executors their costs. On the petition of the legatees, a supersedeas was awarded. The circuit court was of opinion that the county court erred in overruling the second, third and fourth exceptions, which alone were insisted on; and the order of the county court was therefore reversed with costs, and the report directed to be recommitted for the purpose of being reformed accordingly.

On the petition of the executors, a supersedeas was awarded.

Leigh for plaintiffs in error. The first question is whether, under the present circuit court law, a supersedeas lay to the order of the county court. Under the old circuit court law, 1 R. C. of 1819, p. 239, ch. 69, § 56, it was held in Triplett's ex'ors v. Jameson, 2 Munf. 242, that an appeal lay from such an order. But now by the new law, the judgment, proceeding or order to which a supersedeas may go must be "final, and nowise interlocutory." Sess. Acts of 1830-31, p. 50, ch. 11, § 30; Suppl. to Rev. Code p. 145. Here the order settled nothing finally,—established no right to the credits. It merely had the effect of making the account prima facie evidence in case a bill to surcharge and falsify that account should subsequently be filed in chancery by the legatees.

585 *II. There is no ground on which this court can pronounce the allowance of 21 dollars for clerk hire unreasonable or improper. All that we know is, that the commissioners and the county court thought it reasonable, that in point of fact the charge had been incurred by the executors. It may have been expended in procuring the services of a clerk at the sale of the decedent's estate, to keep the account of sales, take bonds from the purchasers, &c.

III and IV. The exceptions to the commissions allowed proceed upon the idea that an executor is only entitled to a commission on money actually collected or bonds actually taken by him, for debts due the testator or proceeds of sales of the estate. Even on this principle, a commission ought to have been allowed on such of the notes as were the proceeds of sales made by the executors. But an executor is not to be thus restricted. The commission is not given merely on account of his personal trouble, but as a compensation also for the risk and responsibility which he incurs.

Patton for defendants in error. The order of the county court disposed finally of the whole case before that court, which then had neither the power nor the materials for any further action. And any order which is the final action of the court in the cause is a final judgment of the court, and nowise interlocutory. What the effect of that judgment may be as evidence,—whether it is to conclude the parties to the proceeding, or merely to operate as prima facie proof of the matters determined by it, in any other and distinct litigation involving the same question, is a consideration which cannot in any degree bear upon the question whether the judgment is final or not. But here the judgment of the county court was pronounced inter partes.

The legatees appeared and controverted the propriety of allowing the items in question. Having done so, they could 586 *not be permitted to file a bill in chancery for the purpose of surcharging and falsifying the account in respect to the same items. Therefore, even in the sense of finality which is contended for on the other side, the judgment of the county court was final: it concluded the legatees until reversed, and left them no means of continuing or reviving the controversy except by the proceeding which they have resorted to.

II. Where an item of an administration account is excepted to, the party relying on the account must prove the item; the burthen of proof is on him; and until that proof is adduced, the item is inadmissible. The other side reverses this principle, and contends that as there is no evidence to shew that the charge for clerk hire was unreasonable, this court cannot say that it was so. The commission ordinarily allowed to the executor is to be considered as full compensation for all the trouble and expense incurred by him in the administration, until its inadequacy is shewn. In Hipkins v. Bernard &c., 4 Munf. 83, it was expressly decided that clerk hire is not to be allowed to an executor generally, though it was allowed in that case under special circumstances; the estate being large, and the administration unusually troublesome, so that a bookkeeper was regarded as necessary.

III. Carter's ex'ors v. Cutting and wife, 5 Munf. 227, decides that where an executor is indebted to the estate, no commission is to be allowed for the collection of that debt.

IV. Hipkins v. Bernard &c., 2 Hen. & Munf. 21, is relied upon as sustaining the fourth exception.

C. Johnson in reply. It should be borne in mind that the present statute was passed after the decision in Triplett's ex'ors v. Jameson, in which the court of appeals with great hesitation came to the conclusion that the appeal might be sustained. It is at least probable, then, 587 *that the emphatic language in the present statute, whereby the proceeding to which a supersedeas may go is required to be nowise interlocutory, was introduced for the purpose of excluding from an appellate court such cases as this, where the whole litigation, however protracted, could settle nothing whatever.

II. It is very probable that the 21 dollars was allowed for the hire of a clerk at the auction sale made by the executors. The payment was made within four or five days after the sale. And the exception is not for defect of proof that the services were rendered, but proceeds on the ground that the allowance is wrong in principle,—that an executor is not to be allowed for clerk hire. There is no such rule. The act of assembly provides that all disbursements by the executor shall be allowed, and that, a compensation for his personal trouble shall also be allowed. 1 R. C. of 1819, p. 389, ch. 104, § 59; 2 Rob. Pract. 369. In Hipkins v. Bernard &c. the charge for clerk hire was allowed as a proper one, in addition to 5 per cent. commission on an estate of 40,000 pounds.

III. The effect of the credit for the whole amount due on Nimrod Branham's note is to make the executors jointly responsible for the amount, and to treat it as cash in their hands. Moreover, the balance appearing against the executors upon the account is only 500 and some odd dollars; so that at least 600 dollars of Branham's note was actually disbursed. The case of Granberry's ex'or v. Granberrys, 1 Wash. 246, decides that an executor may charge himself with the amount of his debt to the estate, and scale it as of the date of the charge, besides being allowed his commission upon it. In 2 Rob. Pract. 368, it is laid down that an executor indebted to the decedent should generally be charged with the amount of the debt due from him, and Decker &c. v. Miller, 2 Paige 149, is there referred to. The case of Carter's ex'ors v. Cutting and wife, 5 Munf. 227, 588 *is no decision of this court on the point for which it was adduced; though the principle is laid down by chancellor Taylor, in the instructions given by him to the commissioner in the court below. What were the circumstances under which that instruction was given does not appear. They may have been such as to render the instruction in that case correct.

IV. The legatees were not bound to accept the bonds, but might have required the executors to collect the money due upon them. Having accepted them as so much money, they cannot object to the allowance of commission on them. The opinion of the chancellor in Hipkins v. Bernard &c., 2 Hen. & Munf. 21, was overruled in toto by this court in 4 Munf. 83. Under the decision of this court in that case, and the other decisions cited in 2 Rob. Pract. 370, the commissions allowed the executors in this case were not unreasonable. It being admitted that the executors are entitled to commissions upon the amount of bonds taken at their sale of the estate, and the legatees being in possession of the bonds assigned them, if they rely upon the fact that a part of the bonds were executed to the testator before his death, they are bound to produce the evidence of that fact; the onus probandi is on them. The executors producing the receipt of the legatees for so much paid them in bonds, make at least a prima facie case of title to commission on the whole.

STANARD, J., delivered the following as the opinion of the court:

The court is of opinion that the circuit court erred in sustaining the exceptions to the allowance of 21 dollars to the executors for clerk hire, and to the allowance to the executors of commission on the amount of bonds due the estate, which the executors passed over to the legatees, and which were, as far as appears, voluntarily received by the legatees from the executors.

589 The court *is further of opinion, that, as a general rule, an executor is not entitled to commission on the amount of debt due from him to the testator, and brought to his debit in the executorial account, and that nothing appears in this case to prevent the application of this general rule to it; and that therefore the county court erred in overruling the exception to the allowance of commission on the debt of the executor Branham to his testator. The executors ought to have had credit for commission on the amount of the credits in the executorial account, except the credit for the said debt of Branham; instead of limiting their commission, as was done by the commissioners of the county court, to the amount of the disbursements. Therefore it is considered that the judgment of the said circuit court be reversed and annulled, and that the plaintiffs in this court recover against the defendants their costs expended in the prosecution of their writ of supersedeas here. And this court proceeding to render such judgment as the said circuit court ought to have given, it is further considered that the order of the county court admitting the account of its commissioners to record be reversed and annulled, and that the plaintiffs in the said circuit court recover against the defendants there the costs by them in the prosecution of their writ of supersedeas in that court expended. And it is ordered that the cause be remanded to the said circuit court, and from thence to the county court, with instructions to recommit the said report of the commissioners, to be so reformed as that, instead of the commission thereby allowed the executors, a commission be allowed them on all the credits to the estate except that for the debt of Branham the executor, and that the account so reformed be admitted to record in the said county court.

From this decree the covenantor alone appeals. HOLD. 1. The objection that the sheriff was no party to the suit, not having been taken in the court below, cannot be made a ground in the appellate court for reversing the decree. 2. The decree was properly rendered in favour of the codefendants of the covenantor, as well as in favour of the plaintiff. 3. The appellant, being bound by his covenant to pay the money, has no interest in the question how it shall be applied, and therefore is not entitled to make the objection that the fund secured by the covenant was not liable to the creditor of the covenantee.

On the 21st of May 1831, an agreement was entered into between Daniel Oglesby and Richard T. Chappell in the following terms:

“Memo. of an agreement entered into this 21st day of May 1831, between Daniel Oglesby of the one part, and Richard T. Chappell (both of the county of Bedford) of the other part, witnesseth that the said Daniel Oglesby doth agree to relinquish and abandon all claims, actions or causes of action, as well on account of several assaults and batteries committed on his the said Oglesby's body by him the said Chappell, as on all other accounts whatsoever.

He the said Chappell, in consideration *of the premises, and for divers other good and valuable causes and considerations, doth bind himself, his heirs &c. to convey in trust for the benefit of the said Oglesby and family two thousand dollars, three hundred of which is to be paid on demand, and the balance in twelve months; the trust to cease on the death of the said Oglesby, at which time one third of its amount is to be paid to Mrs. Oglesby, and the balance to be equally divided amongst the said Oglesby's children. In testimony whereof the said Oglesby and Chappell have hereto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

mark.
Rich'd T. Chappel [L. S.]” “Teste, N. J. Manson,

Balda M'Daniel.”

In pursuance of this agreement, Chappell, on the 6th of June 1831, paid 300 dollars to William Witt as trustee for Oglesby and his family.

On the 18th of July 1831, Oglesby took the oath of an insolvent debtor at the suit of two several creditors, Archibald Robertson and Augustine Leftwich. In each case, the schedule subscribed and delivered in by Oglesby contained the following clause: “A certain Richard T. Chappell hath entered into a covenant to convey in trust for the benefit of myself and family the sum of 2000 dollars, under certain limitations in the covenant set forth. So far as I am entitled to any thing under the said covenant applicable to the payment of my debts, the same is hereby transferred to the sheriff of Bedford." And in neither schedule was any other property surrendered or specified.

In May 1832, Archibald Robertson, one of the creditors at whose suit Oglesby had taken the oath of insolvency, filed a bill in the circuit superior court of Bedford, 592 *against Oglesby, his wife, their three children (all of whom were infants), and Richard T. Chappell, setting forth the debt due from Oglesby to the plaintiff, and Chappell's agreement with Oglesby, and praying satisfaction of the said debt out of the fund which Chappell, by his said agreement, had covenanted to settle upon Oglesby and his family.

On the 4th of June 1832, Chappell, then a resident of Charlotte, was declared a lunatic by the court of that county, which thereupon appointed Josiah W. Chappell committee of his estate. By an amended bill shortly afterwards filed, the said committee was made a defendant in the cause.

Daniel Oglesby, in his answer, stated that the covenant in the bill mentioned was entered into by Chappell as a compensation for the personal injury which he had recently before inflicted upon the respondent by a violent assault and battery upon his body; and submitted to the court whether the sum secured by the covenant was liable to the plaintiff's demand.

Mrs. Oglesby filed a separate answer, insisting that the fund secured by the covenant of Chappell was not liable to the creditors of her husband. Her answer concluded as follows: "If this respondent be entitled to the money, (and she submits that question to the judgment of the court) she prays the court to appoint a suitable trustee, and to direct such investment thereof as the court shall think best for herself and children."

The infant defendants, by a guardian assigned ad litem, answered, submitting to the court the protection of their rights.

Josiah W. Chappell, the committee of Richard T. Chappell, answered, that if the covenant alleged in the bill was ever in point of fact signed and sealed by Richard T. Chappell (of which he required full proof), the same was nevertheless wholly null and void; 1st. because Richard T.

Chappell was insane at the time of 593 executing *it; 2dly, because it was extorted from him by duress and other improper means; and 3dly, because it was unconscionable and without sufficient consideration.

Upon the questions of fact put in issue by the answer of Chappell's committee, numerous depositions were taken and filed on both sides.

The cause coming on to be heard the 16th of October 1834, the circuit court held, that the principal sum stipulated to be secured by the covenant of Chappell was not a debt to Daniel Oglesby himself, and therefore was not liable to his creditors, but that he was entitled to receive the interest during his life, which consequently was liable to them. The court therefore proceeded to decree, that Josiah W. Chappell committee of Richard T. Chappell, out of the estate of the said Richard T. Chappell, do pay unto Balda M'Daniel (who, by consent of the plaintiff and of the defendants Daniel Oglesby and wife, was thereby appointed a trustee under the agreement aforesaid) the sum of 1700 dollars with interest from the 21st of May 1832 till paid; that the said trustee be authorized and required to collect from William Witt the 300 dollars of the trust fund paid to him by Richard T. Chappell, and all interest due thereon; that the whole principal of the trust fund, when collected, be put at interest by the said trustee, upon good security; that out of the interest accrued and to accrue thereon, the said trustee pay the plaintiff his debt, amounting to 445 dollars 7 cents, with interest on 278 dollars 57 cents, part thereof, from the 3d of October 1834 till paid; and that the said committee of Richard T. Chappell, out of the estate of the said Richard T., pay the plaintiff his costs of suit. And liberty was reserved to the plaintiff, and the defendants Daniel Oglesby, his wife and children, to apply thereafter for any such further order and decree as they or any of them might be advised to ask in relation to the said trust subject.

594 *On the petition of Chappell's committee, an appeal was allowed.

The cause was argued here by C. and G. N. Johnson for the appellant, and Leigh and Garland for the appellee.

I. The question mainly discussed was, whether the covenant entered into by Richard T. Chappell was valid and proper to be enforced in a court of equity? But it is unnecessary to report this part of the argument.

II. It was objected for the appellant, that if the plaintiff's claim had any foundation, the sheriff, in whom Oglesby's estate upon his swearing out became vested, should have been a party.

To this it was answered, that all the parties who had any real interest in the cause were before the court. The sheriff was a naked trustee, and if brought into the case at all, he would have been a merely formal party. If the objection was worth anything, it should have been taken in the court below: it could not now be made a ground in the appellate court for reversing the decree. On this point, the counsel for the appellee cited Buck v. Pennybacker's ex'ors, 4 Leigh 5; Moore's adm'r v. George's adm'r, 10 Leigh 228; Mayo v. Murchie, 3 Munf. 397, 8, 400, 404, 409; Story's Eq. Pl. 76, 197.

III. It was objected for the appellant, that the court could not in this case make a decree against him in favour of his codefendants. No issue was made up in any form between the appellant and Oglesby. They were codefendants, both resisting the claim of the plaintiff, but neither having any controversy with the other. Oglesby did not ask the decree which was rendered in his favour: the appellant did not acknowledge any liability to Oglesby, but confined himself to denying the right asserted by the plaintiff. The consideration of the relative rights and liabilities of Oglesby and the appellant was no farther involved in the case, than inasmuch 595 *as the plaintiff claimed through Oglesby his debtor. Under such circumstances, the court should have confined itself to pronouncing on the question which alone was before it, namely whether the estate of Chappell should be held liable to satisfy the plaintiff's debt; leaving Oglesby to assert, in his own way and at his own time, his rights against Chappell's estate, if any he had. Those rights (if any such existed) did not in any manner grow out of the decree in favour of the plaintiff, but were additional to and wholly independent of that decree. For anything this court could know, Oglesby's claim might have been actually released prior to the decree: for he might release his own claim, though not that which his creditor derived through him.

The counsel for the appellee answered, that whatever a decree between codefendants is shewn to be proper by the pleadings and proofs between the plaintiff and defendants, a court of equity not only has the right but is bound to make such decree. Chamley v. Lord Dunsany &c., 2 Sch. & Lef. 710, 718; Conry v. Caulfield, 2 Ball & Beatt. 255; Templeman v. Fauntleroy, 3 Rand. 434; Morris &c. v. Terrell, 2 Rand. 6. Here the pleadings and proofs between the plaintiff and defendants shewed the right of Oglesby and his wife and children to have the fund secured to them under the compromise; and Mrs. Oglesby, in her separate answer, expressly prayed that a trustee might be appointed to receive and invest the fund for the benefit of herself and children. Such a decree as that made by the court was more especially proper in a case like this, where the defendants chiefly interested in the trust fund were a married woman and her infant children.

IV. It was objected for the appellant, that whether the agreement entered into by Chappell was valid or not, the plaintiff had no right to satisfaction of his demand against Oglesby out of the fund thereby stipulated to be secured for the benefit 596 of Oglesby and his family. Roanes v. Archer*, 4 Leigh 550, 568; Scott &c. v. Gibbon & co., 5 Munf. 86, 90.

The counsel for the appellee answered, that if this objection were valid in point of law, still it was an objection which could not be taken by this appellant. If part of a fund which could not properly be subjected to the payment of Oglesby's debts had nevertheless been so applied by the decree, those entitled to the fund, namely, Oglesby, his wife and children, were alone aggrieved, and they alone had the right to complain. They had not appealed, and did not complain. Supposing that Chappell's estate was bound for the money which he covenanted to pay, it was obviously immaterial to the appellant to what party it was paid, or to what purpose applied.

ALLEN, J., delivered the following as the opinion of the court:

Without deciding whether the sum agreed to be paid by Richard T. Chappell, or the interest accruing thereon during the lifetime of Daniel Oglesby, was liable to the debts of said Oglesby, (it being unnecessary so to decide, as the parties who alone could litigate that question have acquiesced in the decree appropriating so much of the interest as might be requisite to the payment of the debt due the plaintiff) the court is of opinion that as to the appellant Chappell, the only party contesting the decree before this court, there is no error in the said decree, and that the same should be affirmed.

above to her during her life. I give to William Clarke, son of my brother Edward Clarke, after the death of my wife, the abovementioned plantation, to him and his heirs forever. My desire is that the abovementioned negroes, as they arrive at lawful age (after my wife's death), shall have their freedom; and if the said Charles should not be of age at my wife's death, my desire is that my brother Edward Clarke have the said Charles until he arrives to the age of twenty-one years; also my desire is that if the said Jenny and Rhoda should not be of age at my wife's death, that Benjamin Lennard have the said Jenny and Rhoda until they arrive to the age of twenty-one years. My desire is that my negro woman Rachael be sold for the payment of my debts. Also my desire is that at my wife's death all my estate, except land and negroes, be divided between my sister Sarah Bowry and Elizabeth Lennard daughter of Benjamin Lennard."

598 *The will concluded with the appointment of an executrix and executor, and they qualified as such.

In February or March 1833, the widow died. At her death there were living various descendants of Lucy, Jenny and Rhoda, born after the testator died. In a suit in chancery between the next of kin of the testator, a decree was made upon the principle that he died intestate as to the descendants so born between the time of his death and the death of his widow, under which decree a division was made.

A bill of injunction was afterwards filed in the circuit court of Charles City, by Jenny and other descendants, suing in forma pauperis for their freedom, against John Ellis and the other next of kin, some of whom it was alleged were about to remove some of the plaintiffs out of the commonwealth.

The plaintiffs contended that the will bestowed on Lucy, Jenny and Rhoda an immediate right to freedom, though it postponed the enjoyment thereof until they should respectively attain the age of 21 years, and until the death of the tenant for life: and they claimed that all the descendants of the said Lucy, Jenny and Rhoda, born after this right to freedom was given, and before the time of its enjoyment, were free also. The circuit court was of opinion that this claim was well founded, and, by a decree made the 13th of July 1843, declared the plaintiffs entitled to their freedom.

From which decree, on the petition of Ellis, an appeal was allowed.

The cause was argued by Taylor and Leigh for the appellant, and by Robert G. Scott for the appellees. For the appellant it was contended that this case was like that of Maria and others v. Surbaugh, 2 Rand. 228, which had been since adhered to in Crawford v. Moses, 10 Leigh 277, and Henry v. Bradford, 1 Rob. 53, and the principle of which is confirmed by de-

599 cisions in *Tennessee, Kentucky and

Maryland, as appears by M'Cutchen and others v. Marshall and others, 8 Peters 220. For the appellees it was insisted, that, taking the whole will together, this case was distinguishable from Maria and others v. Surbaugh, and that it fell more properly within the principle of Isaac v. West's ex'or, 6 Rand. 652. The subsequent cases of Elder v. Elder's ex'or, 4 Leigh 252, Erskine v. Henry and wife and others, 9 Leigh 188, and Anderson's ex'ors v. Anderson, 11 Leigh 616, were also relied on.

CABELL, P. The court is of opinion that this case is not distinguishable from that of Maria & others v. Surbaugh. The decree is therefore reversed, and the bill dismissed.

BROOKE, J. I entirely concur in the opinion delivered by the president for the whole court, that this case comes within the rule which governed the case of Maria & others v. Surbaugh. But as that rule has been sometimes questioned, I shall make some remarks upon it.

The rule is, that the issue shall follow the condition of the mother; a rule taken from the civil law, and adopted by one of our early statutes. The application of the rule in Maria & others v. Surbaugh was to the condition of the mother at the time the issue were born, and not to her prospective condition when she should arrive at the age of thirty-one years, at which period she was to be free. At the birth of the issue she was a slave to all intents and purposes. That was the condition the issue were to follow. To have extended to the issue the future condition of the mother would have been to place them in a condition the mother might never attain, as she might die before she arrived at the age of thirty-one, or she might be sold for the debts of the testator, and might never by the court to the actual condition of the mother at the birth of the issue avoided these contingencies, and was more humane as regarded the issue. There was no legal obligation on the master to take care of the issue, especially in cases in which the mother might be set free at an early age, and before he could be compensated by their labour for the expense of raising them. The property in a slave did not give the right to the master to create a new status of slavery unknown to the law. I differ with justice Thompson in what he says on this subject in his opinion in the case of M'Cutchen & others v. Marshall & others, 8 Peters 220, in which case the rule and application of it in Maria & others v. Surbaugh was followed. He says, that as a general proposition, it would seem a little extraordinary to contend that the owner of property is not at liberty to renounce his right to it, either absolutely or in a modified manner, as he may think proper: that as between the owner and his slave, it would require the most explicit prohibition by law. All this is undeniable as regards his property: but his slave would still be a slave, unless he was authorized by law to manumit him, by renouncing all property in him. I think it one of the highest acts of sovereignty to exalt a slave into the rank of a freeman, as I have before said in one of these cases. It is true that at an early period there was a law prohibiting persons to emancipate their slaves. But it is not to be inferred that the right existed before. As soon as the mischief was felt, it was corrected by law. That maxim of the law, sic utere tuo ut alienum non loras, forbade it, until afterwards the legislature pointed out the mode of emancipation; which unfortunately has not been pursued according to its terms, or the cases of prospective emancipation would never have existed.

601 Matthews & Co. v. Woodson and Others.

January, 1844, Richmond.

(Absent BROOKE and ALLEN, J.)

Husband and Wife*—Marriage Settlements—When Husband Mere Trustee for Wife—Case at Bar.—By deed of marriage settlement, personal property of the wife is conveyed to the husband for the exclusive benefit of the wife and her children during her life, and at her death for her issue, if any then living; and it is provided that in the event of the wife's dying without issue, the property shall be distributed in the same manner as if the deed had not been made. Upon the death of the husband without children (the wife still living), a creditor of the husband, at whose suit the latter took the oath of insolvency, claims that the husband has an interest in the property, which may be charged in the event of the wife's dying without issue. HELD, the conveyance to the husband was merely in the character of trustee, and its effect was to intercept the marital rights of the husband, and preclude him from all beneficial interest during the existence of the trust; that the provision for the event of the wife's dying without issue looked not to the state of things existing at the time of the marriage, but to such as should exist at the death of the wife; that the purpose was in such event to divest the legal title conveyed to the husband as trustee, and let the personal estate stand upon the same footing as any other personal chattels of a wife not reduced into possession by the husband during the coverture; that if the husband had survived the wife, he would have had a right to administer upon her personal estate, and hold the same free from distribution; but in the event that actually occurred, of the survivorship of the wife, the husband at no time acquired any individual ownership of the subject.

By a deed made the 31st of December 1833, between Judith F. Christian of the one part and Charles Woodson of the other part, it was recited, that a marriage was intended to be solemnized between the said Charles Woodson and Judith F. Christian, and it had been agreed between them that the property of every description then owned by the said Judith F. should, previous to the said intended marriage, be conveyed and settled in the manner and for the uses and purposes therein set forth; and it was thereby witnessed that the said Judith F. Christian conveyed unto the said Charles Woodson all her property, consisting of land, slaves and other personalty, in trust that "during the life of the said Judith F. the said Charles Woodson shall hold the said property, and every part thereof, for the sole and separate use and benefit of the said Judith F. and her children, if any she shall have, and apply the profits thereof to and for her sole and separate use, and the use and benefit, maintenance and support of her children, if any she shall have; and after the death of the said Judith F. the said Charles Woodson shall hold the same in trust for the use and benefit of such child or children as she may bear, and may be living at the time of her death; and if she shall have children, and any one or more should die during her life leaving issue, then such issue shall be entitled to the same portion of the estate as the parent would if still living; and after the death of the said Judith, if she shall leave children, the said estate shall be divided and delivered to them by the said trustee as soon as their interest may require it; and if the said Judith F. shall die without issue, then the said property shall be distributed in the same manner as if this conveyance had never been made." The deed then contained a clause declaring that the property, its increase and profits should be held by Woodson for the purposes aforesaid, and should not be liable for any debts or obligation of his, either before contracted or thereafter to be contracted, and that Woodson, notwithstanding the intended marriage and coverture of the said Judith F., should permit her to have the benefit of, use and enjoy the said property, its increase and profits, in common with her children if any, in like manner as if she were an unmarried woman, and that the benefits thereby secured to her she was to have as might suit her best, either in the use and service of the said property, or in the rents, hires or other profits thereof, if it should be thought most advisable to rent or hire it out. And Woodson covenanted that he would not subject the property, or its increase or profits, to the payment of his debts; that he would not sell the slaves or land without her consent, free and voluntary, first had in writing; and then that he would appropriate the proceeds to her sole and separate use, either by purchasing other property, to be conveyed to the same uses before set forth, or in such other way as might better suit the convenience and necessities of her and her children, if any she should have. The marriage took place soon after the deed was made, and the deed was immediately proved and recorded.

Husband and Wife.—The principal case is cited and approved in Coatney v. Hopkins, 14 W. Va. 354. See also, monographic note on "Husband and Wife" appended to Cleland v. Watson, 10 Gratt. 159.

Soon afterwards, to wit, on the 25th of January 1834, Woodson, being in custody under a writ of capias ad respondendum issued against him by William Matthews & Co. for a debt due them, confessed judgment in the clerk's office of Amherst, and thereupon took the oath of an insolvent debtor and was discharged.

Woodson had possession of the property specified in the deed until his death; but after that event the said Judith F. had the possession.

In March 1836, a bill was filed in the circuit court of Amherst by Matthews & Co. against the sheriff of Amherst, in whose custody Woodson was when he took the insolvent oath, and against Judith F. Woodson and Charles Woodson's administrator, insisting that when Charles Woodson took the insolvent oath, all his beneficial interest in the property passed by operation of law to the sheriff; suggesting that it would not be proper for the sheriff to sell the contingent interest of Woodson in the property without the direction of a court of equity; and asking that the question of property might be decided.

604 *The ground taken in the bill is, that Woodson had the legal title to the property, which he held in trust for the separate use of the wife and her children (if she should have any) during her life, and at her death to the use of the children if any, if not, the land to the use of the wife's heirs, and the personal property to his own use, he being the person that would be entitled to it if the deed had never been made.

The defendant Judith F. Woodson answered, that her object in making the conveyance was to secure the property therein conveyed, and its profits and increase, for her own exclusive use and benefit, and that of her children should she bear any, and if not, for the benefit (at her death) of her next of kin, to the entire exclusion of the said Charles Woodson, his creditors and legal representatives, in any event and under any circumstances whatsoever. And she insisted that such was the legitimate construction of the conveyance. She contended that the trust confided to the said Woodson by the said conveyance was a mere personal one, coupled with no interest, and terminated at his death; and that neither the personal representative of the said Woodson, his heirs, or his creditors, had any claim to or interest in the said trust fund, or any part thereof.

The circuit court, being of opinion that Woodson, under the marriage settlement, took no interest, present or future, vested or contingent, but was a mere trustee without the least beneficial interest, made a decree, on the 7th of September 1836, dismissing the bill of the plaintiffs, and adjudging them to pay the defendant Judith F. Woodson her costs.

On the petition of Matthews & Co. an appeal was allowed.

The cause was argued by C. Johnson for the appellants, and Leigh for the appellees.

605 *BALDWIN, J., delivered the following as the opinion of the court:

The court is of opinion that the effect, as well as the intent, of the deed of marriage settlement in the proceedings mentioned, was to intercept the marital rights of the husband in regard to the property thereby conveyed, and to preclude him from all beneficial interest in the subject during the existence of the trusts declared by the deed. The property of the wife was conveyed to the husband merely in his character of trustee, for the exclusive benefit of the wife and her children during her life, and at her death for her issue, if any then living. It is true the deed provides that in the event of the death of the wife without issue, then the property should be distributed in the same manner as if the conveyance had never been made. But this provision looked not to the state of things existing at the time of the marriage, but to such as should exist at the death of the wife. In the event of her death without issue, its purpose was to divest the legal title conveyed to the husband as trustee, and confer the property upon those then entitled by law in her right. The result would be the descent of the real estate to her heirs, and the succession to the personal estate of those designated by law: and the personal estate would stand upon the same footing as any other personal chattels of a wife not reduced into possession by the husband during the coverture. If the husband had survived the wife, he would have had a right to administer upon her personal estate, and hold the same free from distribution amongst her next of kin. But in the event that has actually occurred, of the survivorship of the wife, the husband at no time acquired any individual ownership of the subject. He had not, and could not have during the coverture, any possession of the property in his character of husband; and he moreover never acquired any beneficial interest therein.

606 *The court is therefore of opinion that the claim of the plaintiffs, as creditors of the husband, to subject a supposed contingent interest in the personal property conveyed by said deed, is without foundation; and that there is no error in the decree dismissing their bill.

Decree affirmed.

‡Landlord and Tenant—Lease for Fixed Period—Way-Growing Crops.—At common law where land is leased for a certain number of years, and the period of its termination is fixed and certain, and the lease is silent as to who is entitled to the way-growing crop tled in Harris v. Carson, 7 Leigh 632, that where a lease has a fixed period for its termination, and there is nothing in it purporting to give to the tenant the crops growing upon the land at the time of its termination, the tenant has no right to reap those crops after his lease terminates, again recognized.

Same—Rent—Apportionment in Equity—Case at Bar.—

Pending a suit in chancery by creditors for the sale of their debtor's land, the heirs of the debtor lease the land to a tenant for 3 years from the first of April, unless there shall in the mean time be a decree of sale, in which case the tenant is to give possession on the first of April after the decree. A rent is reserved of $300, to be paid at the end of each year of the tenancy. And according to the true construction of the lease, the tenant has a right to the crops growing on the land at the end of every year for which rent is reserved. In June of the third year, the land is sold under a decree in the creditors' suit, and the tenant applies to the purchasers for permission to proceed with the cultivation of the land; but one of the purchasers, in presence of the other (who had been one of the lessors), refuses, declaring that if the tenant sows the land, he the purchaser will reap the crop; and in consequence of this refusal the tenant proceeds no farther with his preparations for a fall crop, though 607 he remains in possession *of the land the third year. A few days before the expiration of that year, the purchasers sue out an attachment against the tenant for $300 rent to become due the first of April, upon the levy whereof the tenant gives to the sheriff bond and security for the rent. Judgment being obtained on this bond, the same is enjoined as to $200, upon the bill of the tenant praying an abatement of the rent according to equity. Held by two judges, 1. that under the circumstances, the purchasers were not warranted in assuming the relation of landlord for the purpose of coercing the payment of the $300; 2. that there not having been an actual eviction, there was no remedy at law, and it was competent for the tenant to come into equity upon the ground that he was entitled to an abatement; and 3. the evidence justifying the allowance of $200 as a fair abatement, the injunction should be perpetuated.

By articles of agreement under seal, bearing date the 21st of January 1824, between James Mason, Joseph Grantham and four others, heirs and devisees of William Rush on the land at the end of the term, the off-going tenant is not entitled to the crop; but where the lease recognized the right to sow in the last year of the term, and the tenant is restricted to the cultivation of certain portions of the land and pays an equal annual rent for its use he has a right to reap the way-growing crop where the lease is silent as to who is entitled to it. *Kelley v. deceased, of the one part, and Jacob Moyers and Jacob Kroh of the other part, the said heirs and devisees leased to Moyers, at a rent of 300 dollars per annum, a tract of land in Berkeley county containing 306 acres, for the term of three years from the 1st day of April then next, "unless there should be a decree from the chancellor of the Winchester district court, or some other, for the sale of said land for the use and benefit of said Rush's creditors; in which case the said Moyers is to give possession at the expiration of each or any one year, after having a proper notice of such decree." The rent was to be paid annually at the expiration of each year of the term. The lease contained also, among other provisions, the following: "The said Moyers is not to farm more than one half the cleared land on said premises in a year; at any time he should give up said land, the one half is to be clear and ready for tillage. The said Moyers is also not to cut or destroy any timber on said land more than will answer for firewood for one house, except it be for the purpose of making rails to repair the fences on said land.

608 The *said Moyers is also to give said Joseph Grantham and James Mason the privilege of the barn for the purpose of getting out their grain now sowed on said land." Kroh was party to the agreement as the surety of Moyers.

Moyers received possession of the land under the lease, and held the same until the expiration of his term.

On the 26th of June 1826, the land was sold under a decree in the chancery suit referred to in the lease, and James Mason (one of the lessors) and William Short became the purchasers.

On the 21st of March 1827, Mason and Short sued out an attachment against Moyers, for 300 dollars rent to become due on the 1st of April then next, upon the ground that they had just cause to suspect and verily believed that Moyers would remove his effects from the leased tenement before the said rent would become due. The attachment being levied by the sheriff of Berkeley on sundry goods and chattels of Moyers, a bond was executed to the said sheriff on the 23d of March 1827 by Moyers, with Simon Kroh and Jacob Kroh as his sureties, in the penalty of 650 dollars, conditioned for the payment of 300 dollars (the amount of the rent claimed) and all costs on the first day of April then next. On this bond an action was afterwards brought in the county court of Berkeley, in the name of Jacob Wever sheriff of Berkeley, (suing for the use of Mason and Short) against Moyers, Simon Kroh and Jacob Kroh the obligors. The action abated as to Moyers by the return of no inhabitant. In November 1827, a judgment was recovered against the defendants Simon Kroh and Jacob Kroh for the penalty of the bond, to be discharged by the payment of 300 dollars with interest from the first of April 1827 till paid, and the costs of suit.

In May 1828, Moyers and Simon and

Jacob Kroh filed a bill in chancery, in the county court of Berkeley, 609 *against Mason and Short. The facts above detailed were set forth in the bill; and it was further alleged, that immediately after the sale of the land under the decree, Moyers applied to Mason and Short, the purchasers, for permission to proceed with the cultivation of the farm, promising that the rent should be paid to them at the end of the year; that they both refused such permission, and forewarned him not to sow the land, stating that they meant to put it in grain themselves; that Moyers had at that time made considerable progress in preparing the land for the coming crops, and had hired two slaves to work upon the farm; that in consequence of being thus arrested in his farming operations, the labour he had previously expended was lost, and his hirelings remained useless upon his hands; that Mason afterwards told Moyers he might proceed with the cultivation of the land, but the season was then too far advanced to make the necessary preparations to commence seeding; that when the attachment was sued out and levied upon the property of Moyers, he remonstrated against the proceeding as highly iniquitous and unjust, because whatever rent might be due was already amply secured, because he had then no intention of removing from the state, and because he claimed a considerable reduction of the rent for the causes above-mentioned; but understanding that there was no alternative but to give bond for the rent or submit to a sale of his property, and being further advised that whatever reduction he claimed was a matter properly and solely cognizable in chancery, he executed a bond with security as required by the sheriff. The prayer was, that 200 dollars of the judgment recovered on the bond might be enjoined until the matter of the bill should be fully heard; that the rent might be apportioned according to the principles of equity and good conscience; and for general relief.

The injunction prayed for by the bill was awarded.

610 *The defendants put in separate answers, and each respondent positively denied that he had prevented Moyers from proceeding to cultivate the land and make his crop, or had forewarned him to not do so. Short farther stated, that immediately after the sale, he proposed to Moyers that he should go on with his corn crop, haul out the manure upon the fields, and do the fallowing; that defendants should put in the small grain; and that Moyers should only pay as rent, in lieu of the 300 dollars, one third of the crop of corn and oats: to which proposition Moyers voluntarily agreed; but having neglected to comply with his agreement, so that the land was not prepared for a fall crop, this respondent informed him that he would be looked to for the rent stipulated in the lease. Both respondents also demurred to the bill. The ground of demurrer assigned by the respondent Mason was, that the complainants had a full and sufficient defence at law in the suit upon the bond, and ought not now to be entertained in equity.

The evidence adduced for the plaintiffs proved, in substance, the case made by the bill. It appeared, that on the day of the sale, Moyers applied to Mason and Short for permission to proceed with the cultivation of the farm; that Short, in the presence of Mason, refused, declaring that if Moyers should sow the land, he (Short) would reap the crop; and that Moyers, in consequence of this refusal, proceeded no farther with his preparations for a fall crop, though he remained in possession of the land until the expiration of his lease. There was evidence also, that a proposition such as that mentioned in the answer of Short was made by the defendants to Moyers; but there was no evidence that he accepted it. And two of the witnesses deposed, that under the circumstances attending the occupation of the land by Moyers for the last year of his term, 100 dollars would be a sufficient rent for that year.

611 *The county court of Berkeley overruled the demurrers to the bill, and at September term 1833 pronounced a decree perpetuating the injunction with costs. Mason and Short appealed to the circuit superior court of Berkeley; which, on the 6th of September 1834, affirmed the decree with costs.

On the petition of Mason and Short, a judge of the court of appeals allowed them an appeal from the decree of the circuit court.

The cause was argued here by R. C. Stanard for the appellants, and Cooke and C. Johnson for the appellees. But it is unnecessary to report the argument, as it did not embrace the point on which the decision of the court turned, namely, whether the relation of landlord and tenant subsisted between the appellants and Moyers.

BALDWIN, J. By the true construction of the lease between the heirs of Rush and the appellee Moyers, the latter was to be entitled to a waygoing crop, whether the term should expire by efflux of time, or at the end of a previous year, by reason of the event contemplated and provided for by the parties. This is apparent from the stipulation, that Moyers was not to farm "more than one half of the cleared land in a year," and that "at any time he should give up the land, the one half was to be clear," (that is, of a crop) "and ready for tillage." This stipulation could only have been founded upon the understanding that the tenant was to have the privilege of sowing a fall crop in one half of the cleared land, the last year of his term; for, as the term was not to expire, in any event, until the first of April, and the tenant was inhibited from cultivating more than one half of the cleared land at all in any one year, it follows that without such privilege the tenant would have had no benefit from the lease; *inasmuch as the inhibition would have prevented him from cultivating one half the cleared land, and the danger of not reaping what he might sow the other also: unless we suppose that the parties fell into the absurdity of providing that there should be no fall crop in the moiety which the tenant was not to cultivate at all. This construction of the lease is fortified by the circumstance that there was a fall crop in the land, belonging to previous tenants, at the commencement of the term, and by the pleadings in the cause; both bill and answer tacitly taking for granted the privilege of a fall crop under the lease, if the premises had not been sold under the decree.

By the sale under the decree, the purchasers Mason and Short acquired a title to the premises paramount to that of the lessors the heirs of Rush, and a right to the immediate possession, but none to the rent. The effect of the sale would have been to abrogate the lease and exonerate Moyers the tenant from the rent in question, but for the stipulation that the tenant was to surrender possession at the end of the year in which such a sale should be made; by force of which the lessors were bound to assure to the tenant the enjoyment of the premises for that year of the term. If Mason, one of the purchasers, had done this for himself and his co-lessors, the tenant would have been bound to the lessors for the rent of that year. But this he did not do. On the contrary, his copurchaser and coappellant Short prohibited Moyers from putting in a fall crop, and by the pretensions of both Mason and Short in regard to the crop of corn and oats, they asserted their right to the immediate possession of the premises. That right they did not enforce by an ouster of the tenant; but their right to reap the waygoing crop, in the event of its being put in by Moyers, they could, and, the evidence justifies the belief, would have enforced; and he acted discreetly in declining to give them

613 an opportunity *of doing so. Under these circumstances, they were not warranted in afterwards assuming towards Moyers the relation of landlord, for the purpose of coercing payment from him of the rent in question. If he could have defended the attachment on the ground that they were not his landlords, (as to which I express no opinion) and thereby defeated the recovery of the whole year's rent, he was not bound to do it. It was competent for him to place his defence upon the just and equitable ground that he was entitled to an apportionment or abatement of the rent. That was a defence which he could not make at law, in any form, or by any mode of proceeding, there not having been an actual eviction; and it could only be asserted in a court of equity. And the evidence in the cause is sufficient to justify the allowance that has been made of 200 dollars, as the fair and reasonable abatement of the rent.

I am therefore of opinion that there is no error in the decree of the circuit superior court affirming that of the county court.

ALLEN, J. It was held in Harris v. Carson, 7 Leigh 632, that where land was leased for a fixed and determinate period, the offgoing tenant was not entitled in virtue of any supposed custom to the waygoing crop. The tenant, in the case under consideration, claims relief in consequence of his being prevented from putting in a crop, which he could not have reaped until after the determination of his term. Unless such a right was secured to him by the contract of lease, the ground upon which his claim rests will fail him. By the contract, he rented from the heirs of Rush a farm for three years at the annual rent of 300 dollars, the term to commence on the 1st of April 1824. The lease was of an improved farm, and for cultivation; the tenant being restrained from cutting timber
614 except for firewood *and repairs. At the commencement of his term, a portion of the land was in crop; for a privilege is reserved to the previous tenants to use the barn to get out their grain "then sowed on said land." The land is situated in a quarter of the state where small grain is the principal crop. And as it appears that the previous occupants had the privilege retained to them to secure their crop growing in the spring of 1824, when the term commenced; unless the tenant was entitled to the waygoing crop, he would have bound himself to pay a money rent of 300 dollars annually for three years, and have been entitled to but two crops of small grain from which to make it. Such a contract would have been unequal; and though it was competent for the parties to enter into it, the circumstances are entitled to some consideration in ascertaining the meaning of the terms actually contained in the written agreement. If the terms of the contract left the intention of the parties in more doubt than I think they do, those circumstances might tend to shew that the parties contracted in contemplation of the right of the tenant to take three crops in consideration of the three years rent. But it seems to me the words of the agreement can only be satisfied by the recognition of such a right. The lease restricts the tenant from cultivating more than one half of the cleared land in any one year; and then provides that at any time he should give up the land, the one half was to be clear and ready for tillage. Though the writing speaks of his giving up the land at any time, a previous part of it explains this, and shews that by this phrase the parties meant, at the end of any one year of the term, and not at any time within a year. Reference was made to a suit then depending to subject the land to sale, which might put an end to the lease before the three years expired; and it was provided that in the event of a sale, the lessee was to give up the premises at the end of the 615 *year he should receive notice. So that whether he held on to the end of the term or not, neither party contemplated a surrender of the possession at any other time than the 31st of March. The phrase "clear and fit for tillage" can only refer to the ground being in crop; for the land was all cleared. The agreement to have one half clear and fit for tillage must mean, free from crop; and free from crop on the 1st of April of each year: thereby distinctly recognizing the right to have the other half then in culture. At that season of the year and in that country, the only crop which could have been in the ground, according to the ordinary course of husbandry, was the crop of small grain put in the preceding fall. If the contract recognized the right to sow, the right to reap would follow. And in this mode the tenant would be entitled to take the three crops, for which he was to pay the three years rent. The parties themselves, in the pleadings, appears to have put this construction on the contract; for the defendants do not, in their answers, deny the right of the tenant to the waygoing crop, but contend that they did not interfere with the enjoyment of it.

But if by the agreement the plaintiff was entitled to the waygoing crop, the next enquiry is, what has prevented him from enjoying it? He remained in possession until the end of his term. It was in his power to have sowed, and it would have been soon enough to have complained when the defendants should have actually interfered to prevent him from reaping. This objection, at first view, seemed to be conclusive; and I was inclined to think that whatever loss the tenant may have sustained, it resulted from his own omission, and he was entitled to no redress. A more careful attention to the facts in the record has satisfied me that this impression was incorrect. If there had been no change in the relation which the parties bore to each other, and the original lessors or their 616 assignees had *remained the landlords, the objection would have been decisive against the plaintiff. For though the landlord, differing in opinion with the tenant as to the correct construction of the lease, might have warned him not to sow, and declared that if he did he should not reap, such a declaration, not accompanied by any act disturbing the tenant during his term, would have furnished no ground of complaint, much less a foundation on which to lay a claim for damages. But the relation of landlord and tenant according to the terms of the original agreement did not continue. When the lease was made, the parties to it contemplated the probability of the term being terminated before the three years expired, and they provided for that event. In fact it was so terminated; the land was sold under a decree, and the defendants were the purchasers. The lease was made pendente lite, and the purchasers came in under a title paramount to that of the tenant. As purchasers they had a right to the immediate possession, unless, indeed, the decree contained some provision to protect the tenant; and that does not appear, nor is it pretended. The tenant, as against the purchasers, claiming in that character and not as assignees in fact or in law of the lessors, could assert no right under his agreement with the lessors. He became a mere occupier of the premises at the will of the purchasers, liable to be turned out at any moment. Under these circumstances he could not safely do any act against their consent. Though his construction of the agreement was correct, and, so far as his immediate lessors were concerned, he could have asserted his rights against them; against the defendants, purchasers of the property, it would have afforded him no protection. The tenant, in this state of things, called on the defendants immediately after their purchase, to know what he was to do. Then was the time, if the purchasers intended to permit him to hold according to the terms of the 617 *lease, to have announced their determination. But this was not done. They both warned him not to sow a fall crop, declaring that if he did they would reap it. One of the joint purchasers admits in his answer that they asserted their right to possession, and alleges an agreement with the plaintiff, that he was to go on with the fallowing; that they the purchasers would put in the fall crop; and that the plaintiff, instead of the 300 dollars rent, should only pay one third of the corn and oats. Such an agreement is not proved; but the allegation in the answer shews that they disavowed at that time the contract of lease, and insisted on their superior right to the possession. The tenant had made preparations for putting in the crop, but was prevented from doing so by the declarations of the defendants. Under the circumstances it was his duty not to seed against their consent. The land was theirs, and they had the right to the immediate possession, and to put in the fall crop themselves, as they asserted their intention to do. For some reason not appearing, they failed to put in the crop themselves, and when the term had nearly expired, they assumed the character of landlords, and claimed the benefit of the contract, although they had repudiated it in the first instance, and so deprived the plaintiff of the advantage he might have derived from it.

In this proceeding their conduct was oppressive. In fact they were not entitled to any portion of the rent reserved by the agreement. But the plaintiff acquiesced in their claim, either because he supposed it to be just, or because he thought that as purchasers they occupied the position of the original lessors. Acting under the mistaken impression that they were entitled to a portion of the rent reserved, he could not have defended himself on the trial of the attachment as to the residue, for it was not a case for apportionment, as there was no 618 eviction from a part of the demised premises. *It is indeed very questionable whether at law he could have made any defence. The common law writ of replevin, if it could have been maintained in such a case, was abrogated by the act of 1823. And the act of 1819 speaks of the writ of replevin only in cases where goods are distrained for rent. In Redford v. Winston, 3 Rand. 148, two of the judges thought that replevin, either at the common law or under the statute, did not lie in the case of an attachment, and a third considered the question as of little consequence since the act of 1823; from which it may be inferred that he did not suppose it would lie under the statute, as that act merely abrogated the common law remedy. The case of Redford v. Winston decided, that as the law then stood, the tenant was precluded from making any defence which might call in question the truth of the landlord's oath; and one of the judges remarked, that for any wrong thereby done to the tenant, he was left to his action at law, or bill in equity to stay proceedings. The act of 1827 permits the tenant to appear and contest the landlord's right to sue out such attachment; and provides, that if it shall be made to appear that the lessor had no just cause to suspect the tenant would remove, the attached effects shall be restored. As the restoration of the attached effects in one aspect of the case, and the order of sale in the other, are the only proceedings prescribed, and there is no provision for ascertaining the amount of rent, it would seem that the landlord's grounds of suspicion that the tenant will remove can alone be contested under this act. But it is unnecessary to pursue this matter farther, or give any definite opinion upon it. In this case there was no eviction from any part of the demised premises, and there could therefore be no apportionment at law. And if the tenant could have appeared and defeated the whole claim by shewing that the defendants were *entitled to no portion of the rent, it is not for them to object that he has failed to do so, by acknowledging that they were entitled to a part of the rent, the effect of which acknowledgment was to deprive him of a legal defence as to the residue.

Nor do I conceive that this is an attempt to recover unliquidated damages in equity. The defendants, as purchasers, were not bound by the agreement. The plaintiff could maintain no action on it against them for any breach of the covenants. And since they had, as purchasers, a right to immediate possession, he could not have sued them for the exercise of it. If, after they had asserted a claim to the whole rent reserved by that agreement, they might be considered as having recognized the obligation the agreement imposed upon them, it is still not very apparent how the tenant could have proceeded against them at law. It seems to me, that he has pursued the only course which afforded a certain and adequate remedy, and that under the circumstances it was a proper case for the jurisdiction of a court of equity, to make a proper and just abatement, after the tenant admitted his liability as to part.

The evidence is satisfactory to prove that the abatement made was no more than he was justly entitled to.

I think, therefore, that both decrees were right and should be affirmed.

BROOKE, J. There is some difficulty, on the pleadings in this case, in ascertaining whether the defendants Mason and Short are to be treated as purchasers under the decree for the sale of the land, or as landlords according to the lease. If they are to be treated as purchasers under the decree, they certainly could not sue out the attachment on the ground that the tenant was about to remove his effects and leave the state. If they are to be treated as landlords and entitled to sue out an attachment, surely the plaintiff might 620 *at law, on the return of the attachment, have proved that he did not intend to remove his effects and leave the state, and that there was no ground for the charge, and have quashed the attachment. But the main charge in the bill is, that as tenant he was prevented from sowing a fall crop. If so, and he was entitled under the lease to sow the fall crop to be reaped the next summer, the injury could only be redressed by recovery of damages at law, and of consequence he could not come into the court of chancery. But was he entitled under the lease to sow a fall crop to be reaped the next year? His term was to end the April following, and I see nothing in the lease which entitled him to sow a fall crop to be reaped after that period. Harris v. Carson, 7 Leigh 632. As to understanding the lease differently by inferences from circumstances not found in it, (for example, the circumstance that the preceding tenants were allowed to sow a fall crop) I cannot think that such circumstances are to be looked to for any such purpose. Nor do I think that the tenant's being only allowed by the lease to cultivate half the cleared land gave him a right to sow a fall crop the last year of his term. If the lease permitted him to sow only two fall crops in the three years, he may have made a bad bargain, but I do not think I can make a better one for him upon inferences not warranted by the terms of the lease. But how was he prevented from sowing the fall crop the last year of his term? There is not proved any act of the defendants to prevent him. It is true there is some evidence that he was warned by the defendants not to sow a fall crop which he would not be permitted to reap; but whether this warning was given in the character of landlords or of purchasers does not appear.

It could not be in the character of landlords, as, though one of the purchasers, James Mason, was one of the lessors, he was united in the lease with several others, who are not parties in the case,

621 *and he alone was not authorized to warn the plaintiff off the land. It appears to me, the tenant might have had other motives for declining to sow a fall crop. He may have been advised that his lease did not allow him to do so; as he remained on the land till the end of his term. I think that according to the correct construction of the lease, the tenant was not authorized to sow a fall crop the last year of his term, though he was bound to pay the rent: but if he was so authorized, he might have defeated the attachment at law by shewing that the defendants were not his landlords, and also have recovered damages for the seizure of his property. It is said he only wanted an apportionment of the rent, and for this he must come into the court of chancery. But his bill is only against the defendants as purchasers, and only one of them was a lessor. As purchasers, there is nothing in the record to entitle them to the rent under the lease. On that ground the decree is wrong. To apportion the rent, the court ought to have had before it all the lessors of the plaintiff, or their representatives, in order to ascertain what portion of the rent was due.

On these grounds I think the decree ought to be reversed; first, because, if the defendants are to be treated as purchasers, the remedy of the plaintiff was at law for the wrongful distress of his property; secondly, because, if they are to be treated as landlords, they alone were not entitled to seize the property of the tenant, not being entitled to the lease.

XI. Evidence.

I. CREATION OF RELATION.

No Particular Words Necessary.—No set form of words is necessary to constitute a lease, and in doubtful cases the nature and effect of an instrument must be determined in accordance with the intention of the parties, which may be collected from the whole instrument. Upper Appomattox Co. v. Hamilton, 88 Va. 319, 2 S. E. Rep. 195; Mickle v. Lawrence, 5 Rand. 571. So a contract between two persons that one should have certain land and negroes during the life of the other, paying annually a certain sum therefor, is not a sale but is sufficient to constitute a lease. Mickle v. Lawrence, 5 Rand. 571.

By Payment of Rent.—The relation of landlord and tenant may be proved by very slight evidence, and it has been held that the payment of rent by an alleged tenant to the owner is sufficient evidence to establish the relation. Virginia, etc., Co. v. Hoover, 82 Va. 449, 4 S. E. Rep. 689.

Reservation of Part of Crop Does Not Create.—A party in possession of land, but having no title thereto, was authorized by the owner to rent it on shares. This was not considered a lease as the reservation of a part of the crop was not incident to the reversion, and thus gave no right of distress. Lowe v. Miller, 3 Gratt. 205, 46 Am. Dec. 188.

The owner of land, furnishing another with necessities for the support of his family, contracts with him for the raising of crops, and agrees to pay him one-half of the crop raised for his services. It is agreed that the owner shall reimburse himself out of the other share of the crop for the advances made. This contract does not make the parties landlord and tenant. It is only a method of paying for services. Parrish v. Com., 81 Va. 1.

Occupancy by Permission of Owner.—It may be stated as a general rule that the law will imply a tenancy whenever there is an ownership of land on the one hand, and an occupation by permission on the other, for in all of such cases it will be presumed that the occupant intended to pay for the use of the premises. Hanks v. Price, 32 Gratt. 107.

Mere occupancy of land does not necessarily imply the relation of landlord and tenant, yet if the occupant acknowledge the title of the owner, and continue to occupy the land by his leave and license, he ceases to be a mere trespasser, and his possession is that of him whose title he has acknowledged. He cannot, therefore, by afterwards acknowledging the title of another be considered, consistently with good faith and fair dealing, to hold under the latter adversely to the former until after notice in some way to the claimant, or those claiming under him, whose title he first acknowledged. Wilcher v. Robertson, 78 Va. 602.

Acceptance of Lease by One in Possession under Contract to Purchase.—The possession under a contract of purchase may be determined by the acceptance of a lease, and thereafter the relation of landlord and tenant exists between the parties. Locke v. Frasher, 79 Va. 409.

By Occupancy of One Joint Lessee.—Where one of six joint lessees of land enters upon and occupies the premises in accordance with the agreement made with the owner and signed by all, the fact that the remaining lessees do not enter upon the premises does not prevent the occupancy of the one from being the occupancy of all, and they are all lessees of the landlord regardless of their relations. Inter se. Howell v. Behler, 41 W. Va. 610, 24 S. E. Rep. 646.

II KINDS OF TENANCIES.

1. AT WILL OR BY SUFFERANCE.

What Constitutes.—Where a tenant agrees by writing under seal that he will surrender possession when requested by purchaser, he becomes a mere tenant at will or by sufferance. Harrison v. Middleton, 11 Gratt. 527.

Same—Admission in Bill and Answer.—Where the parties to a mining lease agree that it was intended as a lease at will, as admitted by their bill and answer, the lease must be so treated, and the institution of a suit by the lessor determines the lease. Oglesby v. Hughes, 96 Va. 115, 30 S. E. Rep. 439.

Same—Executory Lease.—An executory gas and oil lease, which provides for its surrender at any time without payment of rent or fulfillment of any of its covenants on the part of the lessee, creates a mere right of entry at will, which may be determined at any time by the lessor before it is executed by the lessee. Eclipse Oil Co. v. South Penn Oil Co., 47 W. Va. 84, 34 S. E. Rep. 923.

Both Parties May Terminate Lease.—It is well settled that a lease, which is at the will of one of the parties, is equally at the will of the other. One is no more and no further bound than the other. The lessee and lessor both have the right to terminate the tenancy at will. Cowan v. Radford Iron Co., 83 Va. 547, 8 S. E. Rep. 120; Eclipse Oil Co. v. South Penn Oil Co., 47 W. Va. 84, 34 S. E. Rep. 923.

Possession of a Mortgagor or Assignee.—The possession of a mortgagor or his assignee is not adverse to the mortgagee, and they are tenants at will, unless the assignee takes a conveyance without notice. Newman v. Chapman, 2 Rand. 93, 14 Am. Dec. 766. See monographic note on "Mortgages" appended to Forkner v. Stuart, 6 Gratt. 197.

Possession of Grantor in Trust Deed.—The possession of a grantor in a deed of trust, after the execution of the deed, is not adverse to the title of the trustee, but he holds as his tenant at will or sufferance, and he can be ejected without notice; or the trust subject may be conveyed to a purchaser, whose tenant at will or sufferance the grantor then becomes, by whom he may also be ejected without notice. Creigh v. Henson, 10 Gratt. 231. See monographic note on "Deeds of Trust."

Right of Landlord to Peaceably Enter—Trespass.—In a tenancy at will a landlord is entitled to peaceably enter upon the premises, but this will not justify an illegal search for stolen goods. Such acts make him a trespasser ab initio. Faulkner v. Alderson, Gilm. 231.

2. YEAR TO YEAR.

Holding Over—Receipt of Rent—Inference.—Where a tenant holds over after the expiration of his lease, and the lessor receives rent accruing subsequently to the expiration of the term, or does any act, from which it may be inferred that he intends to recognize him still as tenant, he becomes thereby a tenant from year to year upon the conditions of the original lease. Allen v. Bartlett, 20 W. Va. 46; Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 220, 58 Am. Dec. 217; Williamson v. Paxton, 18 Gratt. 475. Otherwise, he is merely a tenant at sufferance, not entitled to notice to quit. Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 220.

Same—Absence of New Agreement—Presumption.—Where a landlord allows a tenant for a term of years to hold over after the expiration of his term, without any new agreement, he becomes a tenant from year to year, and the law presumes the holding to be upon the terms of the former lease so far as they are applicable to the new situation. Peirce v. Grice, 92 Va. 763, 24 S. E. Rep. 392; King v. Wilson, 98 Va. 259, 35 S. E. Rep. 727; Voss v. King, 38 W. Va. 607, 18 S. E. Rep. 762.

But the presumption of law that a tenant holding over with his landlord's permission is a tenant from year to year may be repelled by proof that he holds over in some other character, or for some other purpose. Williamson v. Paxton, 18 Gratt. 475.

Same—Option of Landlord.—A tenant for years, who holds over after the expiration of his term, without paying rent or otherwise acknowledging a continuance of the tenancy, becomes either a trespasser or a tenant, at the option of the landlord. Voss v. King, 38 W. Va. 607, 18 S. E. Rep. 762.

Extinguished by New Contract.—A tenant from year to year, who has been paying an annual ground rent of six dollars, which was worth much more, and who had built a meat shop on the land, under an agreement that he might remove all buildings erected by himself, executed the following instrument: "On or before the first day of January 1889, I promise to pay to" the lessor "the sum of twenty-five dollars, for rent of beef shop on Main street from Jan. 1, 1888, to Jan. 1, 1889. Given under my hand this 17th day of May, 1888." This instrument established such a new contract as would extinguish the tenancy from year to year. Edwards v. Hale, 37 W. Va. 193, 16 S. E. Rep. 487.

Sale by Trustee—Stipulations as to Purchaser's Possession—Rent.—The trustee for a married woman, with power to sell, sells land by contract, which provides for the payment in cash of a certain sum, and if the purchaser fail by a certain day to do a certain act, that he shall hold the land for a year, and the cash payment shall be the rent for that year. The purchaser fails to do the act, holds as tenant for the year, and then holds over. This does not constitute him a tenant from year to year, and so entitle him to notice to quit; and neither does the payment of rent for the second year have that effect. Williamson v. Paxton, 18 Gratt. 475.

Stipulation to Give Tenant Preference Each Year.—The agreement for the renewal of a lease provides that the tenant is to get the house, at the price stated therein, for one year after his present year expires, and is to have the preference each succeeding year thereafter. It was held that this did not create a tenancy from year to year, so as to entitle the tenant to the legal notice to quit. Crawford v. Morris, 5 Gratt. 90.

3. FOR LIFE.

Rights—Open Mines.—A tenant for life, unless restrained by covenant or agreement, has a right to the full enjoyment and use of the land and all its profits during his estate therein, including mines of oil or gas open when his estate began, or lawfully opened and worked during the existence of such estate. Koen v. Bartlett, 41 W. Va. 559, 23 S. E. Rep. 664. But he cannot open new ones. Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. Rep. 411.

Liability to Account.—A tenant for life in sole possession claiming exclusive ownership, taking petroleum oil, and converting it to his exclusive use, is liable to account on the basis of rents and profits, not for annual rental. Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. Rep. 411.

Liable for Waste.—It is waste in a tenant for life to take petroleum oil from land, for which he is liable to the reversioner or remainderman in fee. Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. Rep. 411.

Same—Jurisdiction.—A remainderman or reversioner has jurisdiction in equity against a tenant for life to enjoin waste, and to have compensation for the damages, the same as if sued at law, to avoid multiplicity of suits. Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. Rep. 411.

Same—Right to Proceed.—A tenant for life, who by waste has severed from the realty petroleum oil, which is a part of it, has no right to have the proceeds invested so that he may have interest therein during the life estate, but the proceeds go at once to the owner of the next vested estate of inheritance. Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. Rep. 411.

Realty Going to Loss—Protection in Equity.—Where there is a life tenant, and timber or other things which is part of the realty going to loss, and imperative need calls for it, equity may cause it to be cut or otherwise be secured for the remainderman or reversioner, if it do no harm to the life tenant, or he be compensated. Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. Rep. 411.

Oil under Tract—Sale—Royalty.—The petroleum oil underlying a tract of land which has been devised to a life tenant who is in possession, and which is to go to certain infant children after the decease of the life tenant, may be sold upon the petition of the guardian of the infants under provisions of ch. 82 of the Code, or may be leased; and the life tenant will be entitled to the interest on the royalty during the continuance of the life estate, and then the residue or corpus of the realty will be paid to the remaindermen. Wilson v. Youst, 43 W. Va. 826, 28 S. E. Rep. 781.

4. JOINT TENANCIES AND TENANCIES IN COMMON.—See monographic note on "Joint Tenants and Tenants in Common."

Joint Tenancy—Additional Lease by One—Presumption.—In order to cure a defect in a joint lease, one of the lessees takes an additional lease in his own name. It will be presumed that he is acting for the benefit of all, and that the additional lease is merely a confirmation of the first lease. Weaver v. Akin, 48 W. Va. 456, 37 S. E. Rep. 600.

Same—Same—Notice of Adverse Claim.—Where one of several joint lessees takes an additional lease in his own name to cure a defect in the first lease, before he can deprive the other colessees of the benefits of the additional lease, he must show that after they had notice that he intended to hold adversely to them, they delayed for an unreasonable time in accepting the terms of the subsequent lease. Weaver v. Akin, 48 W. Va. 456, 37 S. E. Rep. 600.

Same—Same—Same—Dealings Must Be Fair.—If one of several joint owners of a lease, who has cured a defect in the lease by taking a subsequent lease in his own name, for eleven months by his actions leads the rest of the lessees to believe that he has no intention of asserting the second lease in avoidance of the first, but during this time the property is developed in common and mutually enjoyed, he cannot suddenly and without reasonable notice to them, claim exclusive ownership under the second lease. The dealings between them must be fair and open, and free from all deception. Weaver v. Akin, 48 W. Va. 456, 37 S. E. Rep. 600.

Tenancy in Common—Liability for Waste.—It is waste in a tenant in common to take petroleum oil from land, for which he is liable to his cotenants to the extent of their right in the land. Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. Rep. 411. See further, monographic note on "Joint Tenants and Tenants in Common."

III. LEASES.

1. REQUISITES AND VALIDITY.

Certainty in Description.—Lease is not void for uncertainty in description which described the premises as a tract adjoining a certain farm, and formerly occupied by a certain person, containing a specified number of acres. Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 220.

Words of Present Demise—Future Lease Intended.—An agreement to lease a house for a stated time, rental and purpose, concludes with the statement: "The above to be covered by a regular lease subject to approval by all parties." This was held not a binding contract, as words of present demise, however strong, will not constitute a lease, if it can be clearly inferred from the writing that the parties had in mind a future lease. Bolsseau v. Fuller, 96 Va. 45, 30 S. E. Rep. 457.

Privilege of Additional Lease on Giving Notice.—Where a lease is made for five years, with the privilege at the end of the term to extend the lease for an additional five years by giving six months' notice, this does not constitute a present lease for ten years. James v. Kibler, 94 Va. 165, 26 S. E. Rep. 417.

Joint Lease—Separate Tracts—Mine on One.—A husband, owning a tract of land containing 153 acres, and his wife, owning 35½ acres, leased the whole as one tract of 187½ acres for oil and gas purposes, and the rent was paid to both, and receipted for by them jointly, and the royalty was put aside to their joint credit. Although the well was bored upon the husband's tract, this was held a joint lease of one tract of land. Harness v. Eastern Oil Co., 49 W. Va. 232, 38 S. E. Rep. 602.

Right to Use Wharf a Covenant.—In a lease of a lumber yard, and a wharf extending along the entire front of the yard and building adjoining, which stipulated that a third party should have control of the entire wharf, subject to the rights of the tenant of the yard to use that part of the wharf along the lumber yard for his business, the provision in the lease of the warehouse relative to the wharf was not a demise of the wharf but a covenant. Tunis v. Grandy, 22 Gratt. 109.

Mining Lease—Privilege of Searching, Mining and Erecting Buildings.—Where a grantor gives to the grantee the right and privilege of entering upon a tract of land for the purpose of searching for minerals and of mining to such an extent as he might desire, the lessee to have the right to erect and maintain sufficient buildings and machinery to work the mines, using the necessary timber and water for this purpose, the lessee agreeing to pay $25 a year if the minerals were not actually mined, and to pay ten cents per ton for all ores mined and shipped during the time which the mine shall be worked, the agreement was termed therein a "lease" and was to last for ninety-nine years. This was held to constitute a lease and not a mere license which was revocable. Young v. Ellis, 91 Va. 297, 21 S. E. Rep. 480.

A conveyance of the right of searching and digging and working for gold, or other minerals upon the grantor's land, which was to continue as long as the grantees deemed it worthy of searching for the minerals, was held to constitute an unassignable lease in Hodgson v. Perkins, 84 Va. 706, 5 S. E. Rep. 710.

Same—Right of Way for Profits of Mine.—Where a land owner by an agreement assigns to another all his rights to all mineral on his lands "to farm," with the provision that the assignee shall have the right of way over the lands provided he pays to the land owner a certain per cent. of the profits he makes from mining, constitutes a mining lease, which is forfeited when the lessee fails to do the mining in a reasonable time. Shenandoah, etc., Co. v. Hise, 92 Va. 238, 23 S. E. Rep. 303.

Same—Executory—Covenants Not Binding—Right of Entry.—An executory oil and gas lease, which does not bind the lessees to carry out its covenants, but reserves to them the right to defeat the same at any time, and relieve themselves from the payment of any consideration therefor, is invalid to create any estate other than the mere right of entry, which is subject to termination at the will of either party. Trees v. Eclipse Oil Co., 47 W. Va. 107, 34 S. E. Rep. 933.

2. COVENANTS.—See monographic note on "Covenants" appended to Todd v. Summers, 2 Gratt. 167.

a. TO REPAIR AND LEAVE IN REPAIR.

Specified Repairs Enumerated—Property Wholly Destroyed.—In a deed of lease, immediately after the covenant to keep the buildings in repair, and separated from it only by a semicolon, is the provision: "That it will replace, at its expense, all glass broken during its tenancy; that any damage caused by the bursting of water pipes, from failure to turn off water in cold weather, will be repaired at the expense of the lessee; that it will leave the property in good repair." This provision was construed to apply merely to the repairs enumerated, and not to a destruction of the property. Richmond Ice Co. v. Crystal Ice Co., 99 Va. 239, 37 S. E. Rep. 851.

Damage by Unavoidable Accidents Excepted.—A written lease of a building provided that the lessee should keep the same in repair except as to "unavoidable accidents, and natural wear and tear." Held, in an action of assumpsit by the lessee against the lessor to recover for the failure of the latter to repair damages caused by unavoidable accident, that, there being no express covenant that the lessor would make such repairs, the lessee could not recover. Kline v. McLain, 33 W. Va. 32, 10 S. E. Rep. 11, 5 L. R. A. 400.

When a written lease of property provides that the lessee shall keep the same in repair, except as to unavoidable accidents and natural wear and tear, the law will not imply a contract on the part of the lessor to repair damages caused by unavoidable accidents. Clifton v. Montague, 40 W. Va. 207, 21 S. E. Rep. 858, 52 Am. St. Rep. 872, 33 L. R. A. 449.

Mill Destroyed by Movement of Ice.—Where a lessee of a mill covenanted to leave it in repair, and it was carried away by a sudden and unexpected movement of ice, it was held that he was bound to pay the rents, and perform the covenants. Ross v. Overton, 3 Call 309.

Mill Destroyed by Accidental Fire.—A lot was leased for four years with the agreement to return it to the plaintiff with all of its appurtenances. At the time of the lease a gristmill and carding machine were on the premises, and were destroyed by fire from some unknown origin during the term. It was held that the contract was not binding on the tenant to rebuild. Maggort v. Hansbarger, 6 Leigh 532.

Agreement to Make Repairs—No Time Specified.—Where the premises are out of repair at the time of the lease, and the tenant agrees to make certain repairs, without specifying when they are to be made, the tenant has until the end of the lease to make them, unless there is something in the nature of the repairs requiring them to be made sooner. Colhoun v. Wilson, 27 Gratt. 639.

Repairs to Fences.—In the absence of any special covenant requiring the landlord to maintain the fences on leased land, it is incumbent on the tenant to keep the said fences in repair. Hoyleman v. Kanawha, etc., R. Co., 33 W. Va. 439, 10 S. E. Rep. 816.

Statutory Modification.—The rigorous construction put upon covenants to repair at common law has been modified by statutes in Virginia and West Virginia. See § 2455, Va. Code, and § 22, ch. 72, W. Va. Code; also, monographic note on "Covenants" appended to Todd v. Summers, 2 Gratt. 167, where the subject of covenants is fully treated.

b. FOR QUIET ENJOYMENT.

Not Implied from Words of Lease.—Where the defendant by an indenture rented and leased to the plaintiff a tract of land, to have and hold the same so long as she should live, and the defendant entered on the possession of the plaintiff, expelled and removed him, in an action of covenant thereon, it was held on a general demurrer no covenant for quiet enjoyment was implied from the words "rent" and "lease." Black v. Gilmore, 9 Leigh 446, 33 Am. Dec. 253.

In a conveyance of freehold estates words of lease do not amount to a covenant for quiet enjoyment. Black v. Gilmore, 9 Leigh 446, 33 Am. Dec. 253.

c. OF FITNESS OF PREMISES.—There is no implied covenant that demised premises are suitable or fit for the particular use for which they are intended by the tenant. Thus where a party in a written lease describes the property as "the premises known as the 'Bedford Salt Furnace Property,' together with all six salt wells, tools and fixtures of the same," there is no implied covenant on the part of the lessor that there are on said premises six salt wells of any particular productive capacity, or suitable for the purposes for which they are leased. Clifton v. Montague, 40 W. Va. 207, 21 S. E. Rep. 858, 52 Am. St. Rep. 872, 33 L. R. A. 449.

3. CONSTRUCTION.

Agreement to Pay Taxes and Dues—Assessment for Street.—A tenant agreed to pay, in addition to the rent, "all taxes and other public dues in any manner accruing." Assessments for paving the street in front of the property was held not to be included in the covenants of the lease, and when the lessee had paid such assessments he was entitled to recover the amount so paid of his landlord. Bolling v. Stokes, 2 Leigh 178, 21 Am. Dec. 606.

Lease of Railroad—Implied Agreement to Operate.—A branch railroad was built with the aid of county subscriptions for the purpose of giving the county seat railroad connections and conveniences. The road was leased, the lessor agreed to furnish the rolling stock, and the lessee agreed to pay from the annual receipts derived from the operation of the road, the running expenses, the annual rental, the dividends to the stockholders, and to return the line at the expiration of the lease in as good repair as it was when it was received. Although there was no express covenant requiring the operation of the road, the obligation of the lessee to do so for the term of the lease is a necessary implication. Southern Railway Co. v. Franklin, etc., Ry. Co., 96 Va. 693, 32 S. E. Rep. 485.

Failure to Pay Rent an "Abandonment"—Option of Lessor.—The provision in a lease that the failure to pay the rental within a certain time shall be considered as an "abandonment," makes the lease void at the option of the lessor on such failure, only when the covenant was intended for his benefit, and he avails himself of the privilege. Bowyer v. Seymour, 18 W. Va. 12.

Mining Lease—Royalty.—A tract of land is leased for the purpose of mining coal thereon, and is assigned. The lessors reserved as royalty ten cents for every ton passing over a certain screen, and five cents a ton for every ton passing through the screen. The lease also provides that the minimum rental should be $3,000 regardless of the amount of coal mined. A distress warrant being sworn out, and a receiver appointed, the works were closed, with five months' rental unpaid, for which the royalty on the coal actually mined amounted to $500 for the five months, which was decreed to be paid to the lessors. It was held on appeal that the lessors were entitled to five-twelfths of $3,000, which should have been decreed to them for unpaid royalty. Coaldale, etc., Co. v. Clark, 43 W. Va. 84, 27 S. E. Rep. 294.

Same—Same—Rights of Life Tenants and Owners of Fee.—An owner in fee simple makes an oil and gas lease for a term of five years, and as much longer as the premises are operated for oil and gas, or the rent for failure to commence operating is paid, for, among other things, one-eighth part of all oil produced and saved, to be delivered in the pipe lines to the credit of the lessor. The lessor then sells and conveys one undivided moiety or the one-sixteenth part of all the oil produced and saved. Afterwards, but before any oil is bored for or produced, the lessor sells, grants, and conveys the land in fee simple to his six children, to each one a part, by metes and bounds, in consideration of natural love and affection, by deed of general warranty, "except that the party of the second part takes the same subject to any lease for oil or gas made by the party of the first part or any sale of royalty for oil or gas made by him;" and, by the same deed, he retains full control of said land in all respects, and for all purposes, during his lifetime. Soon thereafter oil wells are bored, and oil produced, saved, and put in the pipe lines in large quantities. Held, that one-eighth royalty goes of right to the tenant for life and his grantees, during the continuance of the estate for life, and not to the owners in fee of the es-

Same—Same—Reservation in Grantor.—Land was conveyed in fee, but the grantors reserved to themselves as royalty, one-sixteenth of all oil and petroleum underlying the tract. The grantee leased the exclusive right to drill for oil and gas, reserving one-eighth of all petroleum obtained from the premises. The lease was construed to reserve to the lessor one-eighth of the oil vested in the lessor, and was exclusive of the one-sixteenth, which was outstanding in the original grantor. Harris v. Cobb, 49 W. Va. 350, 38 S. E. Rep. 559.

Same—Same—Perpetuation of Lease.—A lease of land for oil and gas purposes contains the following provision: "Term of lease two years, and as much longer as oil or gas is found in paying quantities. If gas only is found, second party agrees to pay $250 each year, quarterly in advance, for the product of each well while the same is being used off the premises." This was construed to mean that the production in paying quantities of either oil or gas, and the payment of the rent or royalty as agreed upon, would perpetuate the lease during the time of such production. Harness v. Eastern Oil Co., 49 W. Va. 232, 38 S. E. Rep. 662.

Same—Same—Agreement to Mine Certain Average of Ten Years—Termination.—The mining rights in a tract of land was leased for ten years, the lessees agreeing to pay twenty-five cents a ton for all ore mined, and to remove not less than an average of 12,000 tons per year. They paid according to agreement $3000 in advance, which was to be reimbursed by the royalties on the first 12,000 tons mined. This was construed to require an average of 12,000 a year, and not that such amount should be mined each year, and where the lessor had ended the lease at will in sixteen months after its commencement, the lessee could recover whatever amount the advancement exceeded the royalties. Oglesby v. Hughes, 96 Va. 115, 30 S. E. Rep. 439.

Same—Sale—Interest of Parties.—An oil lease investing the lessee with the right to remove all the oil in place in the premises, in consideration of his giving the lessors a certain per cent. thereof, is in legal effect, a sale of a portion of land, and the proceeds represent the respective interests of the lessors in the premises. Wilson v. Youst, 43 W. Va. 826, 28 S. E. Rep. 781.

Same—Conditional.—An oil lease for oil and gas purposes is a conveyance or sale of an interest in land, conditional and contingent on the discovery and reduction to possession of the oil or gas. Lawson v. Kirchner, 50 W. Va. 344, 40 S. E. Rep. 344.

Same—Right of Exploration.—A lease for the purpose of operating for oil and gas for the period of five years, and so much longer as oil or gas is found in paying quantities, on no other consideration than prospective oil royalty and gas rental, vests no present title in the lessee except the mere right of exploration; but the title thereto, both as to the period of five years and the time thereafter, remains inchoate and contingent on the finding, under the explorations provided for in such lease, oil and gas in paying quantities. And the completion of a non-productive well, though at great expense, vests no title in the lessee. Because such lease must be construed as a whole, and, if there is no provision therein contained requiring the boring of another well after the first unsuccessful attempt is completed and abandoned, the lease becomes invalid, and of no binding force as to any of its provisions. Steelsmith v. Gartlan, 45 W. Va. 27, 29 S. E. Rep. 978.

Mortgagee of Term—Liability on Covenants.—A mortgagee of a term of years, though he never enters into possession, is bound to perform the covenants of the lease from the date of the mortgage, like any other purchaser. Farmers Bank v. Mutual Assur. Soc., 4 Leigh 69.

Option to Renew on Conditions—Holding Over—Amount of Rent.—Land was leased for a period of ten years, with an option for an additional period, provided the lessee should build thereon a store-room of a certain value, but if the lease was not continued after the expiration of the first term, then the lessor should pay the lessee the full value of the building. After the expiration of the second term the lessee continued in possession without any additional agreement. In an action for the use of the building the lessee was held only chargeable for the amount of annual rent as fixed by the original agreement which had been paid, and verdict was for defendant. Peirce v. Grice, 92 Va. 763, 24 S. E. Rep. 392.

Lease for Oil Purposes Only—Tenant Not Accountable for Gas from Same Wells.—A landlord leased to his tenant certain premises for the purpose of mining and taking carbon oil therefrom at a fixed royalty and for no other purpose; the tenant opened a well which produced both oil and hydro-carbon gas, the former in small quantities pumped from the well for which the royalty is paid, and the latter in large quantities, issuing by its own force from the well, and which is separated from the oil by the tenant, and by means of pipes conducted beyond the leased premises where it is either sold or appropriated by the tenant for his own use without accounting to the landlord therefor. In a suit brought by the landlord for an account and the value of said gas, held, the tenant is not accountable to the landlord for said gas or its value. Wood County Petroleum Co. v. W. Va. Transportation Co., 28 W. Va. 210.

IV. TERMINATION OF LEASE.

1. AGREEMENT.

Renders Notice Unnecessary.—Where a lease provides that for nonpayment of rent it shall be forfeited and surrendered in ten days' notice, and the lessor demands rent in arrear, and the lessee does not demand notice and pay, but agrees to end the term and surrender his lease, though he has no other notice, the tenancy is thereby ended, and the lessor becomes entitled to possession. Clator v. Otto, 38 W. Va. 89, 18 S. E. Rep. 378.

Agreement to Surrender Possession on Sale—Assignment.—Land was leased for a term of ten years for the annual rental of $150, with the proviso that if the lessor should sell during the lease the lessee should give possession at the end of the current year. The lessee assigned the lease with the same provision, and the assignee also reassigned, but reserving an annual rent of $200, with the understanding that if the original lessor should sell during the lease, then the latter contract should expire. It was held that in accordance with the original covenant between the lessor and lessee, the sale of the premises alone would not determine the lease without surrender by the lessee, which was accepted by the lessor, or at least, without demand of surrender. Dudley v. Estill, 6 Leigh 562.

2. ATTORNMENT.—A tenant cannot destroy the possession of his landlord by a secret attornment to another, and such an attornment as against the landlord is of no effect. Voss v. King, 33 W. Va. 236, 10 S. E. Rep. 402.

3. CANCELLATION.

Option to Cancel.—The lessors of a lease were held entitled to cancel it, when its condition, that it should be void at their option, if certain condemnation proceedings by a railroad were not commenced by a certain day, was not complied with. Laurel, etc., Co. v. Browning, 99 Va. 528, 39 S. E. Rep. 156.

Fraudulent Procurement—Facts—Promises.—Where a lease was procured by means of fraudulent representations of material facts, which were peculiarly within the knowledge of the lessees, with the result that undue advantage was taken of the owners, this constitutes sufficient grounds for cancelling the lease. Rorer Iron Co. v. Trout, 83 Va. 397, 2 S. E. Rep. 713, 5 Am. St. Rep. 235.

False promises by lessees by means of which they were enabled to secure the lease, are not sufficient grounds for setting aside the lease for fraud, as in order to rescind a contract such representation must be made in regard to existing facts. Love v. Teter, 24 W. Va. 741.

Work Abandoned for Seven Years.—Where a lease is made for the purpose of drilling and operating for oil and gas for a term of years, or as long as oil or gas is found in paying quantities, with a provision that the work should be commenced by a certain date, and nothing is done under the lease for seven years after said date, the lessee is presumed to have abandoned the lease, and it is proper for equity to cancel the lease and quiet the title to the land. Crawford v. Ritchey, 43 W. Va. 252, 27 S. E. Rep. 220.

Subsequent Lease Subject to First—Cancellation by Mistake.—Where the lessor of property makes a subsequent lease of the same property with the indorsement that the second lease is taken subject to the first lease, the latter by mistake having been handed back to the lessor to be cancelled, such indorsement saves to the first lessee his right, if any, to have the mistake corrected. Schaupp v. Hukill, 34 W. Va. 375, 12 S. E. Rep. 501.

4. DEATH OF LESSOR.—An executory oil and gas lease, which is not binding upon the lessees to carry out its covenants, but is optional with either party to defeat the same at any time and relieve themselves from the payment of any consideration, is terminated by the death of the lessor. Trees v. Eclipse Oil Co., 47 W. Va. 107, 34 S. E. Rep. 933.

5. FORFEITURE.

How Enforced.—Where a lease for years contains a clause of forfeiture for breach of its covenant to pay rent or other covenant, but no clause of re-entry for such forfeiture, demand and re-entry is not the only mode by which the landlord may enforce the forfeiture. Guffey v. Hukill, 34 W. Va. 40, 11 S. E. Rep. 754.

Forfeiture Must Be Unequivocally Claimed.—When a forfeiture for the benefit of the lessor is contracted for in case of default on the part of the lessee, before the lease can be regarded as at an end the lessor must, by word or deed, in some unequivocal way, manifest a purpose to treat the lease as forfeited. Thomas v. Hukill, 34 W. Va. 385, 12 S. E. Rep. 522.

Mere Refusal to Pay Rent.—A lease for a certain number of years in land, created by deed, will not be forfeited by a simple refusal to pay rent, or any mere words, where there is no open act of unmistakable hostility to the landlord's title, with full notice from the tenant of his adverse title, or assertion of adverse title, and of his holding possession of the premises adversely to the landlord, when no condition or covenant of forfeiture is contained in the deed, especially when the term exceeds five years. Gale v. Oil, etc., Co., 6 W. Va. 200.

Performance of Covenants Prevented by "Act of God."—A lease for oil and gas purposes contained a covenant that the lessee should commence operations for a test well within one year from the date thereof, at some point in the district in which the leased premises were located, and complete such well in eighteen months after its commencement. Before the expiration of a year from the date of such lease the test well was located by surveying and leveling; the timbers afterwards used in constructing the derrick were cut down and hewn; a contract was made with a party for drilling the well; and the machinery was ordered to be hauled to the location, but neither the timber nor machinery was hauled to the location within the year, by reason of the impassable condition of the roads. The well was, however, completed in less than eighteen months after the date of the lease. Held, that the lease was not forfeited on the ground that operations were not commenced within a year from the date thereof. Fleming Oil & Gas Co. v. South Penn Oil Co., 37 W. Va. 645, 17 S. E. Rep. 203.

Effect of Second Lease.—Where the lessor of land gives a subsequent lease of the same property to another person, on which was endorsed before execution that it was taken subject to the prior lease, it was held that the second lease was not an unequivocal declaration of forfeiture of the first. Schaupp v. Hukill, 34 W. Va. 375, 12 S. E. Rep. 501.

In Thomas v. Hukill, 34 W. Va. 385, 12 S. E. Rep. 522, where two leases had been made of the same property, it was held that the execution of the second lease could not be taken as conclusive evidence of a purpose to declare the first one forfeited when by its own terms it shows such not to be the purpose. And if silent on the subject it could be shown that the lessor executed and delivered the new lease on condition that it was to be given back if the first lessee objected, if the obligee knew of the condition. See Stuart v. Livesay, 4 W. Va. 45; Newlin v. Beard, 6 W. Va. 110; Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 812.

A lease for drilling for petroleum oil and gas contained covenants as to the commencement of operations, with the provision that a failure to comply would work a forfeiture of the lease. There was no covenant for re-entry. The covenants were broken, and the lessor leased to another person. The first lease was avoided, and the second was good against it, as the execution of the second lease was a sufficient declaration of forfeiture without demand and re-entry. Guffey v. Hukill, 34 W. Va. 49, 11 S. E. Rep. 754.

Incorporation of Forfeiture Clause by Indorsement.—A mere indorsement on a lease that it is taken subject to another lease does not incorporate in the former lease a forfeiture provision contained in the latter lease. Schaupp v. Hukill, 34 W. Va. 375, 12 S. E. Rep. 501.

Equitable Relief from Penalty.—If, in case of a lease with forfeiture clause for nonpayment of rent, the lessor by his conduct clearly indicates that payment will not be demanded when due, and thus lulls the lessee into a feeling of security and throws him off his guard, and because of this he does not make payments when due, the landlord cannot, without demand or notice, declare a forfeiture, and there is no forfeiture which equity would recognize, and if there is in such case technically a forfeiture at law, equity would relieve against it. Hukill v. Myers, 36 W. Va. 639, 15 S. E. Rep. 151.

The forfeiture clause in a gas and oil lease, under which a valuable estate vested in the lessee in so far as the rentals are concerned, made payable in gas, oil and money, is in the nature of a penalty to secure such rentals, against which a court of equity will grant relief, when compensation for such rentals can be made, and great loss wholly disproportionate to the injury occasioned by the breach of the contract would otherwise result to the lessee negligently, but not fraudulently in default. South, etc., Co. v. Edgell, 48 W. Va. 348, 37 S. E. Rep. 596.

Specific Performance.—The purchaser of an agreement for a lease and those under whom he claims, having committed such acts as would have amounted to a forfeiture had a lease been actually executed with such covenants as were usually inserted in leases to other tenants of the same estate, shall not have the aid of a court of equity to enforce specific performance against a judgment at law recovered by a purchaser of the fee-simple estate. Jones v. Roberts, 3 H. & M. 436.

Waiver—Acceptance of Rent.—Acceptance by the landlord of rent accruing after breach of a condition contained in the lease, with full knowledge of the breach and all of the circumstances, is a waiver of the right to declare a forfeiture and re-enter upon the premises. Hukill v. Myers, 36 W. Va. 639, 15 S. E. Rep. 151; Allen v. Bartlett, 20 W. Va. 54; McKildoe v. Darracott, 13 Gratt. 278.

Same—Quo Animo.—The acceptance of rent after a forfeiture of a lease will be regarded as a waiver of the forfeiture or not, according to the quo animo with which it is received. Jones v. Roberts, 3 H. & M. 436.

Same—Consent of Lessors to Assignment.—A lease of mining lands assigned, and payment was made in part by note. In an action on this note the defendants claimed that the lease had been forfeited previous to the assignment, but the evidence showed that the lessors had acquiesced in the assignment, and had waived the forfeiture by not declaring the lease forfeited until some time after the defendants had been in possession, and had violated the terms of the lease. Judgment in lower court for plaintiff was affirmed. Deaton v. Taylor, 90 Va. 219, 17 S. E. Rep. 944.

Same—Indulgence by Lessor.—Where in an oil lease there is a clause of forfeiture for nonpayment of rental, but the lessor consents that it need not be paid at the times when due, and indulges the lessee, and acquiesces in his failure to pay, there is no forfeiture for nonpayment. Hukill v. Myers, 36 W. Va. 639, 15 S. E. Rep. 151.

Same—No Waiver after Subsequent Lease.—Waiver of forfeiture of a lease for nonpayment of rent cannot be made by the lessor after he has granted a lease of the same premises to another lessee. Guffey v. Hukill, 34 W. Va. 49, 11 S. E. Rep. 754.

A subletting is not a continuing act of forfeiture, and if the forfeiture is once waived it cannot afterwards be retracted. McKildoe v. Darracott, 13 Gratt. 278.

Same—No Revival after Waiver.—A forfeiture, if not by a continuing act, such as a neglect to repair, once waived, cannot be revived. McKildoe v. Darracott, 13 Gratt. 278.

Performance of Condition before Petition.—If land be forfeited for nonpayment of quit rents or want of cultivation, still if the condition be performed before the land is petitioned for, the title is saved. Wilcox v. Calloway, 1 Wash. 88.

6. NEW LEASE.

Amounts to Surrender.—If a lessee for life or years take a new lease of the reversioner for a longer or shorter term than before, it is a surrender of the first lease. Wade v. South Penn Oil Co., 45 W. Va. 380, 32 S. E. Rep. 169; Edwards v. Hale, 37 W. Va. 193, 16 S. E. Rep. 487.

The execution of a new lease to other lessees, and possession thereunder, render a prior executory lease at will invalid. Eclipse Oil Co. v. South Penn Oil Co., 47 W. Va. 84, 34 S. E. Rep. 923.

7. NOTICE OF ADVERSE CLAIM.

Relation Ceases on Notice.—As a general rule a tenant is not permitted to question his landlord's title; yet from the time that the landlord has notice that the person, who formerly held as tenant, claims to be in possession, not as tenant, but in his own right, the relation of landlord and tenant ceases. Campbell v. Fetterman, 20 W. Va. 308; Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 220; Alderson v. Miller, 15 Gratt. 279.

Same—Surrender of Possession.—It is settled law in Virginia that a tenant may dis sever the relation of landlord and tenant without first surrendering the possession of the premises, but in order to hold adversely he must make a clear, positive and continued disclaimer and disavowal of the title of his landlord, who must be put on notice of the adverse claim before a foundation can be laid for the operation of the statute of limitations against him. Neff v. Ryman (1902), 8 Va. Law Reg. 497; Erskine v. North, 14 Gratt. 60, 66; Creekmur v. Creekmur, 75 Va. 480.

Secret Lease or Conveyance.—If a tenant takes a secret lease or conveyance for the land from a third party, claiming to be the owner, without the knowledge of his landlord, the character of his possession will not be changed. Voss v. King, 33 W. Va. 236, 10 S. E. Rep. 402.

Refusal to Pay Rent—Condition in Deed.—An estate for a fixed number of years created by deed will not be forfeited by a simple refusal to pay rent, or any mere words, where there is no open act of unmistakable hostility to the landlord's title, his grantees or assignees, with full notice from the tenant of his adverse title, or assertion of adverse title, and of his holding possession of the premises adversely to the landlord, his grantees or assignees, when no condition or covenant of forfeiture is contained in the deed of lease, especially when the term exceeds five years. Gale v. Oil, etc., Co., 6 W. Va. 200.

8. NOTICE TO QUIT.

Tenant at Will or by Sufferance Not Entitled.—An agreement under seal by a tenant that he would surrender possession whenever a purchaser from the landlord required it, constituted him a tenant at will or at sufferance, and he was not entitled to six months' notice to quit. Harrison v. Middleton, 11 Gratt. 537.

Unnecessary Where Formal Disclaimer Made.—Notice to quit is unnecessary where formal disclaimer has been made by a tenant holding over, before bringing an action against him for unlawful detainer. Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 220.

Tenant Claiming to Hold Adversely.—If a tenant claims to hold adversely to his landlord, he is not entitled to notice to quit. Harrison v. Middleton, 11 Gratt. 537.

Purchaser from Tenant Who Had Notice or Made Disclaimer.—Purchaser in fee under tenant is not entitled to notice to quit before the lessor can maintain an action for unlawful detainer against him and the tenant jointly, where the tenant has received notice to quit or has made a formal disclaimer. Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 220.

Provision That Lease Shall Cease When Lessee Ceases to Work.—Where a lease provides that the same shall terminate and cease whenever the lessee, from any cause, ceases to work for the lessor, and it appears that the lessee had ceased to work for the lessor before the action was commenced, said lessee is not entitled to notice to quit. Marmet Co. v. Archibald, 37 W. Va. 778, 17 S. E. Rep. 299.

What Is Proper Notice.—Where a lease contained a stipulation that if the lessor should sell the demised premises during the term, upon proper notice the lessee should surrender possession, it was held that any notice that distinctly informed the tenant that a sale had been made would be a "proper notice." Neither the law nor the contract required any particular form or length of notice. Millan v. Kephart, 18 Gratt. 1.

Tenancy from Year to Year.—Where a tenancy from year to year has been created, notice to quit must be given by the party wishing to terminate the lease. The period of such notice depends on statutory provisions. Allen v. Bartlett, 20 W. Va. 46. See supra, "II. Kinds of Tenancies," subsection "2. Year to Year."

Five Days' Notice—Tender of Rent—Demand—Unlawful Detainer.—Premises were leased for a term of years, with a clause of re-entry for ten days' default in paying any instalment of rent. Default was made and notice was given the tenant that unless he quit the premises in five days action of unlawful detainer would be instituted against him. The day following the service of the notice the rent was tendered the lessor's agent, who refused to accept it. It was held that as no demands had been made the action was not maintainable either at common law or under the statute. Code 1878, ch. 130, § 4 (§ 2719, Code 1887); Johnston v. Hargrove, 81 Va. 118.

9. PURCHASE OF REVERSION.

Estoppel.—A purchase of the reversion in fee by a tenant for years ends the tenancy, and the tenant is not thereafter estopped from denying further continuing title or rent in the landlord. Wade v. South Penn Oil Co., 45 W. Va. 380, 32 S. E. Rep. 169.

Option in Lease.—Where there is a lease for years with rent, and an option to purchase the fee, an election to purchase under the option, and tender of purchase price under it, ends the lease and its rent. Wade v. South Penn Oil Co., 45 W. Va. 380, 32 S. E. Rep. 169.

Same—Not Inconsistent.—A lease yielding rent and an option to purchase the fee outright are not inconsistent, and the taking such lease during the term of the option will not abrogate or surrender it. Wade v. South Penn Oil Co., 45 W. Va. 380, 32 S. E. Rep. 169.

10. RE-ENTRY AND EVICTION.

Common-Law Rule—Demand before Re-entry.—It is an ancient rule of the common law, that before a lessor can exercise a stipulated right of re-entry for breach of covenant to pay rent, he must make an actual demand upon the tenant for payment thereof, unless by special agreement between the parties the requirement of demand has been dispensed with. Johnston v. Hargrove, 81 Va. 118.

How, When and Where Demand Made.—How, when and where demand for rent in arrear must be made is well settled by the authorities. It must be for the precise sum due for the last instalment, on the day it is due, at some convenient hour before sunset, on the premises, at the most notorious place thereon, and if there be a dwelling-house, at the front door thereof. Johnston v. Hargrove, 81 Va. 118.

Failure to Make Re-entry—Ejectment.—If, on a tenant's failure to fulfill the covenant of payment, or to comply with the landlord's demand therefor, made as prescribed by the common law, the landlord does not re-enter in fact, he may bring ejectment, under Code, ch. 98, sec. 16, and recover, subject to the provisions of sec. 17, as to the tenant's being completely barred of all rights, etc., in 12 months. Bowyer v. Seymour, 18 W. Va. 12. See monographic note on "Ejectment" appended to Tapscott v. Cobbs, 11 Gratt. 172.

Possession under Contract of Purchase—Demand.—One who has taken possession of land under a parol contract of purchase from the owner cannot be ejected at the suit of a grantee of the owner, where there has been no previous demand for possession, since he is tenant at will of the owner. Jones v. Temple, 87 Va. 210, 13 S. E. Rep. 404, 24 Am. St. Rep. 649.

Removal during Term.—The simple fact, that a tenant moves off the leased premises during his term, does not entitle his landlord to enter and put another tenant in possession; and if the landlord does so enter during the term, the first lessee may recover the premises from the second lessee by action of unlawful entry and detainer. Chancey v. Smith, 25 W. Va. 404, 52 Am. Rep. 217.

Abandonment—Demand—Option.—Where a lease provides that the failure to pay the rent within sixty days after it is due shall constitute an abandonment of the same, and the tenant fails to comply therewith, and the landlord demands payment at the time, place, and in the manner prescribed by common law, and the payment of the rent is not made in proper time, he is at his option to enter upon the premises, or such part thereof as can be entered upon by him. Bowyer v. Seymour, 18 W. Va. 12.

Demand—No Property Liable for Rent.—If a grant be made, reserving a yearly rent with a condition that the grantor may re-enter if the rent be not paid after demand made upon the premises, if no property is found on the land, whereof distress can be made; the grantor, upon demand made, and failure to pay, no property to distress being found on the land, may re-enter and grant over to another. Wartenby v. Moran, 8 Call 491.

Definition of Eviction.—The term eviction may be defined as not a mere trespass, but something of a grave and permanent character done by the landlord, with the intention of depriving the tenant of the enjoyment of the demised premises. Tunis v. Grandy, 22 Gratt. 109.

Surrender No Eviction.—In a suit against the lessor of premises, to which the tenant was not a party, a decree directing the sheriff to lease the demised premises, which was done, the tenant giving possession, his surrender was held not to amount to an eviction. Murray Caldwell & Co. v. Pennington, 3 Gratt. 91.

Sub-lease—Remainder Rented with Consent of Landlord—No Eviction.—On October 3rd, 1792, land was leased for a term of five years. On Nov. 9th, 1795, the lessee demised the remainder of his term to M., who agreed with the landlord in May, 1797, that he might rent the remainder of his year to whomsoever he wished. Accordingly the landlord rented to G. for two years. In an action by the original lessee against G. it was held the lease to G. was not an eviction of the plaintiff, and did not prevent the landlord's recovering a balance due for rent on the original contract. Cooke v. Wise, 8 H. & M. 468.

Recovery by Title Paramount—Discharge of Rent.—If leased land be recovered by a third person by title superior to that of the lessor, the tenant is discharged from the payment of rent after the eviction by such recovery. Tunis v. Grandy, 22 Gratt. 109.

Wrongful Deprivation of Whole or Part of Premises Discharges Whole Rent.—If a lessor wrongfully deprives a tenant of the whole or any part of the premises, the tenant is discharged from the payment of the whole rent until such possession is restored. Tunis v. Grandy, 22 Gratt. 109. See section on "Rent."

If the tenant be at any time deprived of leased premises by the agency of the landlord the obligation to pay the rent ceases. Tunis v. Grandy, 22 Gratt. 109.

Liability of Lessee—Warranty.—In the absence of an express warranty, a lessee is not liable for an eviction of his assignee of the lease under paramount title. McClenahan v. Gwynn, 3 Munf. 556.

Conveyance in Fee—Election.—Conveyance in fee by tenant is no disseisin of the lessor, except at the latter's election. Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 220.

Liability of Landlord—Original Lessee—Assignee.—If the landlord is liable in case of eviction under paramount title to the original lessee, he is equally liable in damages to the assignee. McClenahan v. Gwynn, 3 Munf. 556.

V. ASSIGNMENT OF LEASE.

Relation Attaches to All Succeeding to Possession.—It is an elementary principle, which has been repeatedly approved by the Virginia courts, that when the relation of landlord and tenant has been once established, it attaches to all who may succeed to the possession through or under the tenant, whether immediately or mediately; and the succeeding tenant is as much bound by the acts of his predecessor as if they were his own. Neff v. Ryman (1903), 8 Va. Law Reg. 497; Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 224.

Where the lessee of a term for years holds over, creating a tenancy from year to year, and assigns his lease, the assignee holds subject to all the stipulations and conditions in the original lease. Allen v. Bartlett, 20 W. Va. 46.

An assignee of a lease is fixed with notice of its covenants, and takes the estate of the assignor cum onere, and each successive assignee of a lease, because of privity of estate is liable upon covenants maturing and broken while the title is held by him. W. Va., etc., R. Co. v. McIntire, 44 W. Va. 210, 28 S. E. Rep. 696.

Liability of Landlord to Assignee.—The landlord is liable to the assignee of a lease for damages whenever he would have been similarly liable to the lessee. McClenahan v. Gwynn, 3 Munf. 556.

Lease of Factory—Assignee Assumes Liabilities—Rights of Lessor.—A factory was leased for the annual rental of two-thirds of its product, with the stipulation that a certain quantity should be produced each year, the lessee agreeing to sell the lessor's share. It was further agreed that the lease should not be sub-let or assigned without the written permission of the lessor, who had the privilege of terminating it on two months' notice. Within a year the lease was assigned, and the lessor entered into a new agreement with the sub-lessee, the latter assuming all of the lessee's liabilities. The sub-lessee paid off the debts of the lessee. For the failure of the lessee to manufacture the required amount the lessor was entitled to damages, but as the new lease was made within a year, the lessee's covenant was not broken, and therefore the sub-lessee was only required to account to the lessor for two-thirds of the stock left by the lessee, after deducting all expenses attending the sale of what was sold. Prestons v. McCall, 7 Gratt. 121.

Assignees Holding Over—How Amount of Rent Determined.—Salt works held under a lease by court, which lease terminated January 1, 1861, was assigned by the lessee in 1859 for a term of ten years, the assignees holding over from the termination of the lease in 1861, until the end of the assignment in 1869. It was held that, in determining the rent for which the assignees should be held liable, the court might require them to produce, before the commissioner selected to ascertain and report what would be a reasonable rent, all contracts in their possession or control by which leases of the property were made to them, or privileges granted to others to manufacture salt during the period of their lease, and all books and accounts and papers in their possession or control showing the quantity of salt manufactured during such period, and delivered to them by their sub-lessees, or those to whom such privileges were granted under the contract. Stuart v. White, 25 Gratt. 800.

VI. CROPS AND IMPROVEMENTS.

Crops—Fixed Term—Way-Going Crop—Common-Law Rule.—At common law where land is leased for a certain number of years, and consequently the period of the term is fixed and certain, and the lease is silent as to who shall be entitled to the growing crop on the land at the end of the term, the off-going tenant is not entitled to such way-going crop; but where the lease recognizes the right to sow in the last year of the term, and the tenant is restricted to the cultivation of certain portion of the land and pays an equal annual rental for its use, he has a right to reap the way-going crop, where the lease is silent as to who is entitled thereto. Kelley v. Todd, 1 W. Va. 197; Harris v. Carson, 7 Leigh 682.

Where a lease has a fixed period for its termination, and there is nothing in it purporting to give to the tenant the crops growing upon the land at the termination of the lease, the tenant has no right to reap those crops after his lease ends. Mason v. Moyers, 2 Rob. 606.

Where land is rented for a fixed and certain period, the way-going tenant is not entitled to the way-going crop. Harris v. Carson, 7 Leigh 682, 30 Am. Dec. 510.

Stipulation for Wheat Crop Harvested after Term Ends—Rights Thereto.—A lease for a term of years stipulated that the land should be sown with wheat and timothy the last autumn of the term, which terminated in the spring. At the end of the term the lessee vacated, and they were leased again to another lessee, who harvested the wheat. It was held that the first lessee was entitled to recover of the second lessee the value of the wheat. Kelley v. Todd, 1 W. Va. 197.

No Restriction as to Cultivation—Right to Plow Certain Field.—In a suit to enjoin the defendant from injurious cultivation of the land of his lessor, by plowing a certain river bottom set in blue grass in order to cultivate it in corn, it appeared that by the terms of the lease all the land was rented with no restrictions as to its cultivation, except that it was agreed that it should be farmed in such manner as to prevent injury to it, in so far as injury could be reasonably prevented; that the land had been in corn for twelve or fifteen times in the last thirty years; that it was good farming to plow this piece of land, as it never washed as other portions of the land did, but was the best corn land on the place, and was easily reset in blue grass. The injunction was dissolved. Hubble v. Cole, 85 Va. 87, 7 S. E. Rep. 242.

Improvements—Removal.—Where the terms of a lease require the lessee to erect buildings upon the leased premises, and there is no agreement for their removal by the lessee, he has no right to remove them. Peirce v. Grice, 93 Va. 763, 24 S. E. Rep. 302.

"Renewable or Pay for Improvements."—Where the language of a lease is that it is "renewable or pay for the improvements," after a renewal of the lease, the lessee is not entitled to the value of the improvements. King v. Wilson, 98 Va. 250, 35 S. E. Rep. 727.

VII. ESTOPPEL OF TENANT.

1. GENERALLY.

To Attorn.—In a suit to sell land it was sold to the plaintiff who conveyed it, and the grantees put a tenant in possession. Upon appeal a reconveyance was ordered, the first sale being set aside, and the deed was executed. Thereupon the tenant attorned and afterwards gave possession to the original owner, to whom the reconveyance had been made. On ejectment the relation of the tenancy did not estop the tenant to attorn. Miller v. Williams, 15 Gratt. 213.

To Repel Claim for Rent.—If a tenant has occupied and enjoyed the use of land, he will be estopped in an action by the landlord for the rent to repel his claim on the ground that the lease was void. Watson v. Alexander, 1 Wash. 340. See section on "Rent," infra.

To Acquire Rights at Tax Sale.—A tenant who is bound under the lease to pay the taxes on demised premises cannot by purchase at a tax sale acquire any rights against his lessor. Williamson v. Russell, 18 W. Va. 612.

To Claim Forfeiture.—A lease of coal lands to a company contains the condition that unless condemnation proceedings by a railroad company for a line to the land be commenced by a certain time, the lease shall be void at the option of the lessor. The owner of land sought to be condemned refuses to sell the right of way, and subsequently acquired the interest of some of the lessors. The condition being broken, it was held that he was not estopped from claiming a forfeiture of the lease. Laurel, etc., Co. v. Browning, 99 Va. 528, 39 S. E. Rep. 156.

To Deny Boundaries.—Tenant is estopped to deny boundaries of the demised premises as described in the lease, or that his possession is within them, in an action for unlawful detainer, where he has executed the lease acknowledging such description and possession. Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 220.

To Deny Covenants in Lease.—Where a written lease describes the property as containing six salt wells, the recitals as to the number of wells included in the premises after the lease has been accepted and acted on for more than two years by the lessee, with ample opportunity of knowing, not only the contents of the lease, but also the character and quality of the leased property, must be regarded as conclusive of the fact between the parties to the lease. Clifton v. Montague, 40 W. Va. 207, 21 S. E. Rep. 858.

To Deny Power of Lessor to Contract by Assumed Name.—Where an action of unlawful detainer is brought by a mining company in its proper corporate name against one of its tenants, although the lease was in writing, and executed by the company in a name different from its true corporate name, assumed for its own convenience, the tenant accepting said lease, and occupying the premises, and paying rent thereunder is estopped from denying the power of the corporation to contract in its assumed name. Marmet Co. v. Archibald, 87 W. Va. 778, 17 S. E. Rep. 299.

Sub-tenants Bound by Acts of Predecessor.—When once the relation of landlord and tenant is established by the act of the parties, it attaches to all who may succeed to the possession through or under the tenant whether immediately or remotely, the succeeding tenant being as much bound by the acts and admissions of his predecessor, as if they were his own. Allen v. Bartlett 20 W. Va. 46.

2. TO DENY LANDLORD'S TITLE.

General Rule.—The general rule is firmly established that the possession of the tenant is the possession of the landlord, and is not adverse to him, and the tenant will not be allowed to deny his landlord's title. Allen v. Paul, 24 Gratt. 382; Rakes v. Rustin Land, etc., Co., 2 Va. Dec. 156; McClung v. Echols, 5 W. Va. 215; Gale v. Oil, etc., Co., 6 W. Va. 210; Campbell v. Fetterman, 20 W. Va. 412; McFarland v. Douglass, 11 W. Va. 652; Miller v. Williams, 15 Gratt. 218; Reusens v. Lawson, 91 Va. 258, 21 S. E. Rep. 347; Bushong v. Rector, 32 W. Va. 317, 9 S. E. Rep. 227; Dobson v. Culpepper, 23 Gratt. 352; Voss v. King, 38 W. Va. 236, 10 S. E. Rep. 402; Voss v. King, 38 W. Va. 607, 18 S. E. Rep. 762; Bodkin v. Arnold, 45 W. Va. 90, 30 S. E. Rep. 154; Hodgkin v. McVeigh, 86 Va. 751, 10 S. E. Rep. 1065; Hurst v. Dulany, 84 Va. 701, 5 S. E. Rep. 802; Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 220; Locke v. Frasher, 79 Va. 409; Genin v. Ingersoll, 3 W. Va. 558; Creekmur v. Creekmur, 75 Va. 430; Suttle v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 76 Va. 289.

It was held in Stuart v. Andrews, 1 Va. Dec. 449, which was an action of unlawful detainer to recover the possession of land which had been leased, that where the defendant had acknowledged the right of the plaintiff "by a solemn contract under his hand and seal, under which contract he came into the possession and enjoyment thereof, and obligated himself to return the same to the plaintiff at the expiration of the lease, by the law as established for ages, he is estopped to deny his title, and is bound by his solemn covenant to surrender to him the possession."

Exception to Rule.—But, if a party is in possession of land under a claim of title, and is by fraud or mistake induced to believe that another has a better title to it, and thereby to take a lease from him, the tenant is not estopped by the lease from denying the landlord's title and showing that he has a good title to the property. Alderson v. Miller, 15 Gratt. 279; Turpin v. Saunders, 33 Gratt. 33; Locke v. Frasher, 79 Va. 409; Gale v. Oil, etc., Co., 6 W. Va. 210; Jones v. Fox, 20 W. Va. 380; Voss v. King, 38 W. Va. 241, 10 S. E. Rep. 403. See also, Voss v. King, 38 W. Va. 607, 18 S. E. Rep. 762; Bodkin v. Arnold, 45 W. Va. 90, 30 S. E. Rep. 154.

Rule Applies Only When Controversy is between

Landlord and Tenant.—The rule that a tenant cannot deny the title of his landlord applies only in actions against the tenant for rent or possession, but does not render the tenant incompetent to deny such title in a controversy between other parties and the landlord, in which such tenant has no interest. Bartley v. McKinney, 28 Gratt. 750.

Rule Does Not Apply When Tenant Claims Life Estate, Which Landlord Has Acknowledged.—The rule that a tenant cannot set up against his landlord in ejectment an adversary title in a stranger, does not apply where the title set up by the tenant is a lease for life from the person under whom the plaintiff claimed to one under whom the tenant claimed, the validity of which the plaintiff had admitted by the regular annual receipt of the rents stipulated therein, from defendant and those under whom he claimed, down to a period of two months before the institution of the suit. Smoot v. Marshall, 2 Leigh 134.

Rule Not Affected by Possession under Contract of Purchase at Time of Lease.—The operation of the general rule that the tenant cannot deny his landlord's title is not affected by the fact that tenant is in actual possession, as under a contract of purchase, at the time he accepts the lease; that by such acceptance he as effectually recognizes the title and possession of the lessor as if he had entered and taken possession under and by virtue of the lease itself. Jordan v. Katz, 89 Va. 628, 16 S. E. Rep. 866; Locke v. Frasher, 79 Va. 409; Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 220.

No Adverse Possession without Full Notice.—The relation of landlord and tenant is one carefully guarded by the law, and it will not allow one who has come into the possession of land under another to set up an adverse claim to it, without full notice of his disclaimer or assertion of adverse title. Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 221, 237; Creekmur v. Creekmur, 75 Va. 430, 436; Reusens v. Lawson, 91 Va. 226, 21 S. E. Rep. 347. See next section, "3. Adverse Possession of Tenant," infra.

Applies to Substituted Tenant.—Possession of land obtained from the tenant of another is merely the substitution of one tenant for another, and such substituted tenant cannot be heard to set up title or possession in himself adverse to that under which he entered. Genin v. Ingersoll, 2 W. Va. 558.

Estoppel Attaches to All Successors under Tenant.—Tenant's estoppel to deny lessor's title attaches to all successors who acquire possession through or under such tenant, either immediately or remotely. So where one acquires possession under an absolute conveyance in fee from the tenant, the rule applies. Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 220.

Applies to One Living with Tenant and Helping Pay Rent.—One living with a tenant and helping to pay the rent cannot acquire any rights to the demised land by adverse possession. Hodgkin v. McVeigh, 86 Va. 751, 10 S. E. Rep. 1065.

Tenant Estopped in All Actions.—In an action by a landlord against his tenant, whether the action be debt, assumpsit, covenant, or unlawful detainer, where neither fraud nor mistake is shown in the procurement of the lease, no proof of title is required by the landlord, for in such case the tenant is estopped from denying the title of his landlord. Voss v. King, 38 W. Va. 607, 18 S. E. Rep. 762.

Same—Direct or Collateral.—Tenant is estopped to impugn landlord's title during the tenancy, or until he has restored possession, or done something equivalent thereto, either by proof of title in himself or another, whether the question arises in a direct action to recover possession or in a collateral action. Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 220.

Rule Not Applicable When Possession Surrendered or Recovered.—A tenant who surrenders possession at the end of his term, or from whom possession is recovered, is not prevented by the existence of such tenancy at one time, or by the deed of lease which he executed, from contesting the title of his former landlord. Wild v. Serpell, 10 Gratt. 405.

Finding by Special Verdict.—Where a special verdict finds that both the tenant of land, and one claiming possession of it claim an estate in fee simple under the same person, it is a finding of the seizin of the claimant, and the tenant is estopped to deny it. Creigh v. Henson, 10 Gratt. 231.

Absolute Deed—Mortgage—Rental—Injunction.—A lot is bought and a house is built thereon for one party, with money furnished by another, who takes the deed in his own name as security. Default being made in the monthly payment of money, which was agreed to be done until the debt was extinguished, by mutual consent the property was placed with a real estate agent who rented it to the purchaser. The parties subsequently had a disagreement as to the amount of rent, the grantee threatening to sue to recover the land, a suit was brought by the purchaser to enjoin the proceedings to recover the property. It was held that the bill should be dismissed as by the agreement under which the plaintiff became defendant's tenant, the former waived all rights under the deed, and was estopped to deny the defendant's title. Jordan v. Katz, 89 Va. 628, 16 S. E. Rep. 866.

8. ADVERSE POSSESSION OF TENANT.

Notice of Disclaimer and Adverse Possession—A tenant cannot set up an adverse title against his landlord unless he first gives notice to the latter that he disclaims the relation and holds adversely. Voss v. King, 83 W. Va. 236, 10 S. E. Rep. 403; Allen v. Paul, 24 Gratt. 332; Genin v. Ingersoll, 2 W. Va. 558; Reusens v. Lawson, 91 Va. 226, 237, 21 S. E. Rep. 347; Hulvey v. Hulvey, 92 Va. 182, 23 S. E. Rep. 233; Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 221; Creekmur v. Creekmur, 75 Va. 430.

As was said in the late case of Neff v. Ryman (1902), 8 Va. Law Reg. 497, quoting from Reusens v. Lawson, supra, "The relation of landlord and tenant is one carefully guarded by the law, and it will not allow one who has come into possession of land under another to set up an adverse claim to it, without full notice of his disclaimer or assertion of adverse title."

Deed Accepted from Other Than Landlord—Adverse Claim—Notice.—Thus if a tenant accept a deed from another person than his landlord, purporting to convey the land to him in fee, and later conveys it in fee to another, and he and his alienees claim the land in their own right under such conveyance, with the knowledge of the landlord, the possession by the tenant and his alienee is adverse. Swann v. Thayer, 26 W. Va. 46, 14 S. E. Rep. 423; Swann v. Young, 26 W. Va. 57, 14 S. E. Rep. 426.

Acceptance of Lease When in Possession—Termination—Surrender—So a lessee in possession may accept a lease from one claiming to be the owner, and after the termination of his term terminate his tenancy by disclaimer and notice to such person, and he will not in such case be required to surrender the possession before he will be allowed to set up an adverse title in himself or a third person. Voss v. King, 83 W. Va. 236, 10 S. E. Rep. 402.

Restoration of Possession by Substituted Tenant.—And before a substituted tenant can set up adverse possession he must restore the possession acquired through the tenant of another and assert his claim, or give notice to the landlord or cotenant of his claim, or he must actually oust the tenant. Genin v. Ingersoll, 2 W. Va. 558.

Property Surrendered in Acquiring Rights Subsequent to Relation.—If a tenant acquires rights adverse to his landlord subsequent to the creation of the relation, he must surrender the property before he can assert such adverse rights. Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 220.

Lessor Must Have Notice.—Tenant's possession does not become adverse by his holding over and disclaiming to hold under the lessor, and claiming the fee, unless full notice thereof is brought home to the lessor. Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 220.

Evidence Required.—In order to make a tenant's possession adverse to his landlord, the notice of such adverse holding need not be shown by evidence so convincing as to preclude all doubt. Reusens v. Lawson, 91 Va. 226, 21 S. E. Rep. 347.

Person Living with Tenant and Helping Pay Rent.—A person who lives with a tenant and helps to pay the rent cannot acquire an adverse possession against the landlord while such condition exists. Hodgkin v. McVeigh, 86 Va. 751, 10 S. E. Rep. 1065.

Church Trustees Holding Property.—Church trustees holding property placed trustees of another church in possession thereof, and the latter acknowledged the former's title. The latter will not be allowed to set up any adverse right or title to their landlords, unless they prove that they disclaimed holding of them, or in good faith abandoned the premises, or asserted and claimed an adverse right with notice thereof to their landlords three years previous to the institution of the suit. Allen v. Paul, 24 Gratt. 332. See generally, monographic note on "Adversary Possession" appended to Nowlin v. Reynolds, 25 Gratt. 137.

VIII. RENEWAL IN GENERAL.

By Holding Over.—Where a tenant in possession under a lease continues in possession after the expiration of the term, the law implies a renewal of the lease on the same terms. Voss v. King, 83 W. Va. 607, 18 S. E. Rep. 762. See section "II. Kinds of Tenancies," subsection "2. Year to Year."

Effect of General Covenant for Renewal.—It is well settled that a general covenant for renewal in a lease does not imply a perpetual renewal. The most a lessor is bound to give on such a covenant is a renewal for one term only. Thus where land was rented for one or ten years at twenty-five dollars per annum, with the following provision "renewable, or pay for the improvements at their valuation" and the lessee holds over without any new agreement after the expiration of a renewal of ten years, the lessor was entitled to the possession of the premises at the end of any one year. King v. Wilson, 98 Va. 250, 35 S. E. Rep. 727; Peirce v. Grice, 92 Va. 763, 24 S. E. Rep. 392.

By One Joint Lessee—Notice.—Where six parties become joint lessees of real estate for the term of five years, with the privilege of continuing the lease for an additional term of five years, upon giving sixty days' notice prior to the end of the term, one of the lessees has no power to extend the lease by giving the required notice unless the other lessees concur therein. Howell v. Behler, 41 W. Va. 310, 24 S. E. Rep. 646.

By Purchasers of Share of One Joint Lessee—Notice.—A lease is made to six joint lessees for five years, with the privilege of an extension for an additional five years, upon sixty days' notice prior to the end of the term. Possession is taken by only one of the lessees, who dies before the expiration of the term. At the sale of the estate of the deceased lessee, a purchaser of the lease cannot extend the term for an additional five years, and a bill by him to enforce specific performance as to the extension of the term will be dismissed. Howell v. Behler, 41 W. Va. 610, 24 S. E. Rep. 646.

Lease Renewable Forever—Condition Not Complied with—Rent Paid Promptly—Notice to Quit—Tender.—A lease of land is made for ninety-nine years, renewable forever. It provides that the rent shall be paid annually on the first day of June in every year, and if the annual rent remains unpaid for six months after it becomes due, then the lessor shall re-enter and hold as formerly until all arrears in rent are paid. It is further provided that at the expiration of the term the lessor, in case the conditions are complied with, so as to entitle a lessee to a renewal, shall execute a new lease for the same term and on the same conditions as the first, except that one year's rent extraordinary, and the charges of making and recording the conveyance, shall be paid by the lessee at the time of the renewal, and that the lease may be continued forever at the expiration of each term by making new leases, subject to the above conditions. The right to renew is not lost where all the rents were paid without demands, although not upon the exact date when due, and notwithstanding that for several years after the termination of the first lease, the rent was paid and accepted as formerly, without any offer or demand for renewal; the lessee having immediately, on notice to quit from the lessor, made a tender of everything required. Selden v. Camp, 95 Va. 527, 28 S. E. Rep. 877.

1. IN GENERAL.

Definition.—Rent signifies a compensation or return, being in the nature of an acknowledgment given for some corporeal inheritance, and though of late years it usually consists of money, yet formerly it consisted of, and still may consist of, things incapable of any profit. Newton v. Wilson, 3 H. & M. 470.

How True Rental Estimated.—The true annual rental value of land is not the value of all the farm products which can possibly be realized from its use when the land is stocked, farmed, and managed with the greatest skill and industry, but it is the price which a prudent and industrious farmer can afford to pay for its use, after taking into consideration the probable amount and market value of his crop, and the probable injuries thereto resulting from the ordinary changes of climate and season. Moore v. Ligon, 30 W. Va. 146, 8 S. E. Rep. 572.

In estimating the rents and profits of land, which has been wrongfully held by the vendor in a contract for its sale, the annual value of the land in the hands of a prudent and discreet tenant upon a judicious system of husbandry is the proper rule in the case, which should be influenced in some measure by the mode of treatment by the occupant. Bolling v. Lersner, 26 Gratt. 36.

Landlord Has Insurable Interest in Tenant's Furniture.—Where a tenant owes rent to his landlord, the latter has an insurable interest in the tenant's furniture, while on the premises, as such is liable by statute for the debt of the tenant. Mut., etc., Ins. Co. v. Ward, 95 Va. 231, 28 S. E. Rep. 209.

Ground Rents in 1779—Scale of Depreciation.—Where there was conveyance of land in fee simple in 1779, upon a ground rent, charged thereon, payable in current money, the rent was subject to the scale of depreciation. Watson v. Alexander, 1 Wash. 340.

Rents Reserved by Lord Fairfax—Rents Charge.—The rent of five shillings sterling reserved by Lord Fairfax upon lots in the town of Winchester, Va., were not quit rents, but rents charge. Nor were such rents destroyed by any of the acts of the commonwealth passed during the Revolutionary War. Marshall v. Conrad, 5 Call 864.

2. WHO ENTITLED TO RENT.

Land Sold under Decree.—Land was sold under decree of court after a contract had been made for its rental. The purchaser was complete owner from the day of sale, and was entitled to the rent falling due thereafter. Taylor v. Cooper, 10 Leigh 317.

Guardian Leasing Ward's Land.—A guardian may lease the lands of his ward, during infancy, if the guardianship so long continues, and may reserve the rents to the ward or to himself; and payment of the rent, in either case, to the guardian, would be good. Ross v. Gill, 1 Wash. 87. See monographic note on "Guardian and Ward" appended to Barnum v. Frost, 17 Gratt. 308.

Devise of Rents and Reversion—Purchase of Reversion by Lessee.—The owner of land leased it for a term of twenty years, with the privilege to the lessee to end the term at any time on paying five shillings. The lessor then devised the annual rental to his daughter, and the reversion to his son, who sold to the lessor, and the latter immediately terminated his lease. It was held that the lessee could not disappoint the legatees, and he was decreed to pay them the rent. Graham v. Woodson, 2 Call 249.

3. WHO LIABLE FOR RENT.

When Part Only of Joint Lessees Take Land.—Where two of four joint lessees of land take possession in accordance with the agreement made between the owner and all of the lessees, the occupancy of the two is the occupancy of all, and they are all lessees of the landlord and are responsible to him in an action for use and occupation, regardless of their relations inter se. Goshorn v. Steward, 15 W. Va. 637.

Death of Tenant during Term—Estate Liable.—When a married woman becomes lessee of property for a term of years, her estate is liable for rent during the whole term, although she died soon after making the lease, and the property is occupied by others, as the lease continues as the property of the estate. Hutchings v. Commercial Bank, 91 Va. 68, 20 S. E. Rep. 950.

Lis Pendens—Successful Claimants.—Where the purchaser of property at a judicial sale had notice of a pending suit, setting up an adverse claim to the property, he is liable to the adverse claimants for rent, they being adjudged entitled to the property, although he immediately delivers possession, and shortly after title, to another, who is insolvent. Simpson v. Dugger, 88 Va. 963, 14 S. E. Rep. 760.

Partnership Occupying Premises under Unauthorized Lease.—One member of a partnership without authority from his copartners leases a tenement for a term of years by deed, which he signs and seals in the partnership name. The house is used and occupied for a portion of the term for partnership purposes, and the yearly rents are credited to the lessor on the books of the partnership. The partner who signed the deed having died, his surviving partners abandon the tenement, and the executor and devisee of the lessor files a bill against them and the administratrix of the deceased partner for specific performance, and for a decree for rents for the residue of the term. It was held that although the deed of lease executed by one partner alone was not binding upon the partners, yet the agreement for the lease for the use of the partnership was binding on them, and was not extinguished by the deed, and as the partnership took the benefit of the lease, the surviving partners shall execute the agreement, and pay the rents for the whole term. Kyle v. Roberts, 6 Leigh 495.

Tenant Who Has Enjoyed Land.—If a tenant has enjoyed the land, he cannot repel the landlord's claim or rent, by saying "he has nothing in the land," or that the conveyance was void. Watson v. Alexander, 1 Wash. 340.

Voluntary Surrender of Premises to Sheriff.—In a suit between third persons and a lessor, to which the tenant was not a party, the sheriff was directed by a decree to rent out the demised premises, which was accordingly done and the tenant yielded possession. As the decree did not direct the sheriff to evict the tenant, and there was no paramount title under which he might have been evicted, his surrender did not release him from the payment of rent. Murray Caldwell & Co. v. Pennington, 3 Gratt. 91.

Absolute Sale—Intention to Reserve Rent.—Where there was an absolute sale of property, but the intention of the parties was to reserve the rent to the grantor for a number of years, the grantees incur a personal obligation to account to the grantor for the rent. Kyles v. Tait, 6 Gratt. 44.

Covenant to Deliver Possession on Sale—Assignment—Surrender.—Land was leased for a term of years with the understanding that if the lessor sold the premises during the term the lessee should give possession at the end of the current year. The lessee assigned the lease with a similar provision, and the assignee, the plaintiff, assigned the term to the defendants, reserving a yearly rent to be paid as long as the lease lasted, with the provision that if the original lessor should sell the property agreeably to the original contract between him and his lessee, then the latter contract should expire. It was held that the defendant was not relieved from his covenant to pay rent by the sale of the premises, if there was no surrender. Dudley v. Estill, 6 Leigh 562.

Lessee Stipulating to Pay Rental Until Well Is Completed.—A person who accepts an oil or gas lease, with a stipulation therein contained to pay a monthly rental until a well is completed, or until the termination of a certain fixed term, is bound to pay such rental, although he does not within such term enter upon the land and complete the well, unless he was prevented from doing so by the plaintiffs and not by mere personal default. Lawson v. Kirchner, 50 W. Va. 344, 40 S. E. Rep. 344.

4. APPORTIONMENT AND ABATEMENT.

Partial Eviction by Landlord Suspends Entire Rent.—An eviction of the tenant by the landlord from a portion of the premises suspends the payment of the entire rent during the continuance of the eviction. Tunis v. Grandy, 23 Gratt. 109.

Same—Crop of Hay Mowed and Taken Away.—A landlord entered upon a part of leased premises, and mowed and carried away the hay without the consent and against the will of his tenant, who nevertheless continued to occupy the premises until the end of the year. In an action of assumpsit for the use and occupation of the land it was held that by such entry the landlord lost the benefit of the entire contract, and was not entitled to recover any portion of the rent. Briggs v. Hall, 4 Leigh 484, 26 Am. Dec. 326.

Complete Destruction of Premises.—It was agreed in the lease of a mill that the lessee should keep it in repair, except that heavy repairs, as injury by floods to the dam or forebay, or if the main shaft or wheel should give away, requiring a new one, should be made by the lessor in a reasonable time, which should not operate to suspend the rent. The mill was completely destroyed by an accidental fire, and the lessor refused to rebuild. The rent was held to be suspended from the time of the fire. Thompson v. Pendell, 12 Leigh 591.

Possession under Contract Held Void—Chargeable for Time Held.—Where a purchaser under a contract with a married woman was deprived of his purchase by reason of the fact that the contract was held not to be binding upon her, he was chargeable with the fair rental value of the land while he had it in possession, in the condition in which it was at the time he took possession thereof. Moore v. Ligon, 30 W. Va. 146, 3 S. E. Rep. 572.

Same—Improvements—Taxes.—Where a purchaser under a contract of sale with a married woman enters upon land and makes valuable improvements thereon, which greatly enhances the value thereof, and the contract was held not binding upon the married woman, the tenant was entitled to abatement on the amount of rent, with which he was chargeable, the value of the improvements, and all taxes upon the land paid by him while in his possession. Moore v. Ligon, 30 W. Va. 146, 3 S. E. Rep. 572.

Lease of Mill and Negro Miller—Emancipation.—A lease was made of a mill together with a tract of land adjoining, and a negro man as a miller, for a term of years, rendering an annual rent; the miller had previous to the lease been emancipated by the lessor by a deed entered of record, and before the expiration of the first year left the services of the lessee. It was held that the lessee was entitled to an apportionment of the rent. Newton v. Wilson, 8 H. & M. 470.

Two Leases—Partial Eviction—Partial Possession—Distress—Action for Use and Occupation.—If a tenant under a second lease is put into possession of the whole of the demised premises, and is afterwards evicted from a part thereof by the lessee under the first lease, then the rent will be apportioned, and the lessor may distrain for it. But if the lessee under the first lease is in possession, so that the lessee under the second lease cannot get possession of a part of the premises demised to him, then the second lease as to this part is void and the lessor cannot distrain for a portion of the rent, though he may recover the fair value of the balance of the premises in an action for use and occupation. Tunis v. Grandy, 23 Gratt. 109.

Partial Recovery under Title Paramount.—If part only of leased land is recovered by a third person by a title paramount to that of the lessor, such an eviction is a discharge of so much of the rent as is in proportion to the value of the part evicted. Tunis v. Grandy, 23 Gratt. 109.

Possession of Wrong Land by Mistake.—Where the vendor of land delivers to the vendee by mistake other land, which does not belong to him, and the vendee is evicted, he will not be compelled to pay rent for the time he remained in possession, although he holds the full quantity purchased by certain metes and bounds. Nelson v. Suddarth, 1 H. & M. 350.

Deprivation of Crops by Threats.—While a suit was pending by creditors of a deceased person to subject land to the payment of their debts, it was rented by the owners for three years with the agreement that if it should be sold during the term then the lease should terminate on April 1st following the sale. In June of the last year of the term it was sold, and in consequence of the threats of the purchasers, one of whom was one of the lessors, to reap any crops that might be sowed, the lessee did not sow any fall crops. It was held that he was entitled to a deduction from his rent on that account. Mason v. Moyers, 2 Rob. 606.

Evidence under General Issue.—In an action of debt for rent, on the plea of the general issue the defendant may give in evidence special circumstances showing that the rent ought to be apportioned. Newton v. Wilson, 3 H. & M. 470. See section on "Evidence," infra.

5. INTEREST.

Not Allowed When Sufficient Property on Premises Liable to Distress.—Interest on rents in arrear ought not to be allowed if there were always effects on the premises, liable to distress, sufficient to have satisfied the rent, which were not paid, though demanded by the landlord. Dow v. Adam, 5 Munf. 21.

Interest on rents will not be allowed where the lessor allows it to accumulate, because he might have distrained for it if it were certain. If it was uncertain, interest was not demandable. Skipwith v. Clinch, 2 Call 253.

Depends on Circumstances.—Interest cannot be recovered as a matter of course in actions for the recovery of rent, but it may be given under circumstances to be judged of by the jury. Mickie v. Lawrence, 5 Rand. 574.

Where a jury state in a special verdict the circumstances under which they allowed interest in an action for the recovery of rent, the court should disallow the interest if, under the circumstances stated, interest ought not to be allowed. Dow v. Adam, 5 Munf. 21.

Allowed on Estimated Rents.—Where land is occupied by consent of the owner it is proper to charge interest upon estimated rents and profits. Vance v. Evans, 11 W. Va. 342.

When there is a decree for specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, and for an accounting of the rents and profits, although in such case the rents are estimated, it is proper to charge interest on them. Bolling v. Lersner, 26 Gratt. 36.

Interest Not Allowed.—But interest was not allowed on estimated rents and profits in Roper v. Wren, 6 Leigh 38, and Payne v. Graves, 5 Leigh 561.

Not Recoverable by Way of Damages.—Interest is not recoverable by way of damages in an action of debt for rent in arrear. Cooke v. Wise, 3 Hen. & M. 463.

Not Allowed on Rents in Arrear.—In Kyle v. Roberts, 6 Leigh 495, interest was not allowed on balance of rents in arrear.

Allowed Where Tenant Attempts to Defeat.—In Graham v. Woodson, 2 Call 249, interest was allowed on rents in arrear, as the defendant by unconscientious conduct had endeavored to defeat the rents altogether.

Delay in Prosecuting Claim for Ground Rents.—It was held in Mulliday v. Machir, 4 Gratt. 1, that the proprietor of land upon which rent was reserved, having delayed for many years to prosecute the claim for the ground rents, would not be allowed interest thereon.

Replevy Bond—From Date of Bond.—Judgment ought not to be rendered on a three months' replevy bond for interest from a day anterior to the date of the bond, but it may be rendered for interest from the date of the bond on the rent and costs of the distress. Williams v. Howard, 8 Munf. 277.

Act of March 2, 1827.—Under the act of March 2, 1827, a landlord was entitled to interest on rent in arrear, from the time it was due. Brooks v. Wilcox, 11 Gratt. 411.

6. LIEN.

By Statute in Virginia.—It was held in Re Wynne, Chase (U. S.) 228, 30 Fed. Cas. 752, which case came up from the United States circuit court for Virginia, that by § 12, title 41, ch. 128, of the Revised Code of Virginia adopted in 1860, a lien for rent was given to the landlord on goods upon demised premises, independently of any proceeding by distress or attachment.

By Statute in West Virginia.—A lien is given by § 12, ch. 98, W. Va. Code 1891, for one year's stipulated rent, whether accrued or not, upon the goods of a tenant on the premises, over liens created after the commencement of the tenant's term, although no distress warrant has been issued for such rent. Anderson v. Henry, 45 W. Va. 319, 31 S. E. Rep. 998.

Goods Must Be on Demised Premises.—The landlord's lien for a year's rent on the goods and chattels of his tenant does not extend to protect them from being taken by virtue of any execution, except in cases when the said goods and chattels shall be in or upon the demised premises. Gelger v. Harman, 3 Gratt. 130.

Priority—Lien for Taxes Superior.—The lien for taxes in West Virginia is superior to the landlord's lien for rent. Bartlett v. Loundes, 34 W. Va. 493, 13 S. E. Rep. 762.

Same—Deed of Trust by Tenant—New Term.—A deed of trust was given on personal property by the tenant holding for a term of years, the lease containing no agreement for renewal. At the expiration of the term, a new term was agreed upon on terms materially different from the first lease. This was held to create a new tenancy and to give the deed of trust priority over the lien for rent due under the last lease. §§ 11 and 12, ch. 134, Code 1873, construed. Upper Appomattox Co. v. Hamilton, 33 Va. 319, 2 S. E. Rep. 195; Wades v. Figgatt, 75 Va. 575; Richmond v. Duesberry, 27 Gratt. 210.

Same—Tax Sale—Purchase by Lessee—Mortgage—Distress.—Goods are on leased premises, liable to rent. They are levied upon for taxes against the lessor, and sold therefor on the premises without removal, the lessee becoming the purchaser, and, he not paying the purchase money, two parties assume payment of it; and shortly after, while the property remains on the leased premises, the lessee executes to these two parties a deed of trust conveying such property to indemnify them against loss in case they should pay; the sheriff who sold the property still retaining possession after the execution of such deed of trust until actual payment to him, which payment is made by the parties who assumed it. After such payment the trustee takes possession of the property, and a distress for rent is made on the property within thirty days after its removal from the premises. The distress for rent has preference over the deed of trust. Bartlett v. Loundes, 34 W. Va. 493, 12 S. E. Rep. 762. See monographic note on "Subrogation" appended to Janney v. Stephen, 2 Pat. & H. 11.

Same—Assignment and Purchase of Furniture—Deed of Trust—Holding Over—Distress.—On January 1st, 1871, a house was leased for the period of one year. In March, without the assent of the lessor, a third person took the lease, and purchased his furniture on the premises, having borrowed the money and conveyed the furniture to secure the creditor. The assignee paid rent to the lessor and at the end of the term held over, and in March, 1872, without the consent of the lessor turned the house and furniture over to another, who paid the rent to the lessor until July or August, failing to pay any rent for the rest of the year. Then the lessor sued out a distress warrant which was levied on the property already conveyed in the trust deed. The holding over by the assignee in 1872 was held a new lease, and the lien of the deed of trust existing then, was valid against the lien for rent for 1872. Richmond v. Duesberry, 27 Gratt. 210, and note.

7. PAYMENT.

When Entitled to Additional Time.—Where the lessee of a mine has made frequent efforts to pay the rent, and the lessor has purposely prevented him, the lessee should be given additional time in which to pay the rent. Young v. Ellis, 91 Va. 297, 21 S. E. Rep. 480.

8. SET-OFF.

Lease from Executor—Debt Due by Testator.—A tenant having leased land from an executor cannot set off debts due to him by the testator against the rent. It might be otherwise, if the executor has acknowledged that he had a sufficiency of assets. White v. Bannister, 1 Wash. 166. See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

Rents Payable Direct to Cestui Que Trust—Drafts of Trustee.—By order of court the rents of trust subject are decreed to be paid directly to the cestui que trust by the receiver. The trustee was held to have no powers in the matter, and his drafts against the lessee could not be set off against the rent. Witt v. Warwick, 83 Va. 609, 3 S. E. Rep. 352.

9. RECOVERY.

a. ASSUMPSIT.—See monographic note on "Assumpsit" appended to Kennaird v. Jones, 9 Gratt. 183.

On Implied Promise.—Assumpsit for the use and occupation of land by permission of the plaintiff lies on an implied as well as an express promise to pay rent. Sutton v. Mandeville, 1 Munf. 407, 4 Am. Dec. 549.

On Express Promise.—Assumpsit for the use and occupation of land by permission and assent of the plaintiff, will lie at common law on an express promise to pay the plaintiff a certain sum, or in general terms to pay him to his satisfaction for such use and occupation. Eppes v. Cole, 4 H. & M. 161, 4 Am. Dec. 512.

Lease Not Sealed—Statute.—The action of assumpsit for use and occupation of land is maintainable under the statute, § 7, ch. 98, W. Va. Code 1868, where the agreement of lease is not by deed. Goshorn v. Steward, 15 W. Va. 657.

Plaintiff Confined to Terms of Contract.—In an action of assumpsit by the lessee against the lessor, the plaintiff will be confined to the terms of the contract sued on, and cannot recover upon a verbal understanding made contemporaneously with the written lease. Kline v. McLain, 33 W. Va. 23, 10 S. E. Rep. 11, 5 L. R. A. 400.

b. ATTACHMENT.—See monographic note on "Attachments" appended to Lancaster v. Wilson, 27 Gratt. 624.

Rent Not Due—Amount.—An attachment against the estate of a tenant for rent to become due at a future day cannot issue for more than the rent next due. Redford v. Winston, 3 Rand. 148.

Same—Revised Code.—By § 9, ch. 118, 1 Rev. Code, the lessor is not entitled to an attachment for rent not yet due, before the commencement of the term for which rent is to be paid. Johnson v. Garland, 9 Leigh 149.

Same—Same—Quashal.—If an attachment for rent not yet due be issued before the commencement of the term for which it is to be paid, and levied on the goods of the lessee, and the lessee thereupon enters a recognizance to pay the rent, he may, notwithstanding, move the court to which the process is returned to quash the attachment for irregularity. On such motion the court ought to quash the attachment and the recognizance likewise, which was founded upon it. Johnson v. Garland, 9 Leigh 149.

Same—Removal of Goods—Plea by Tenant.—Where an attachment is issued against the estate of a tenant for rent to become due at a future day, on the oath of the landlord that he has sufficient grounds to suspect that the tenant will remove his effects out of the county or corporation before the expiration of his term, it is not competent for the tenant on the return of the attachment to plead that his landlord had not sufficient grounds to suspect that the tenant was about to remove his effects. Redford v. Winston, 3 Rand. 148.

Grounds—Property under Deed of Trust—Threatened Removal by Trustee.—When the lessee, after removal of property to the leased premises, executes a deed of trust thereon, threatened removal of such property by the trustee authorizes attachment for rent. Offterdinger v. Ford, 92 Va. 636, 24 S. E. Rep. 246.

Same—Removal of Goods—Construction of Statute.—The statute, § 4, ch. 148, Code 1873, authorizing an attachment against a lessee's goods for rent not due, when he is removing, etc., so that probably sufficient goods will not be left to satisfy the claim for rent when due, applies to all removals, in regular course of business or otherwise, as there is no exception made in the statute, and the language is plain. Offterdinger v. Ford, 92 Va. 636, 24 S. E. Rep. 246. See further, monographic note on "Attachments" appended to Lancaster v. Wilson, 27 Gratt. 624.

Interpleading.—The section of the statute which allows interpleading in attachments without bail does not extend to attachments for rent. Hallam v. Jones, Gilmer 142.

c. COVENANT.—See monographic note on "Covenant. The Action of."

In covenant on a lease stipulating to pay rent, and binding the lessee to board the lessor and wife part of the term and to return the premises uninjured, the declaration described so much of the agreement as related to leasing and paying rent, and charged the lessee with having broken the covenant generally, and particularly in failing to pay rent, but said nothing about other stipulations.

This variance was not substantial. Backus v. Taylor, 6 Munf. 488.

d. DEBT.—See monographic note on "Debt, The Action of" appended to Davis v. Mead, 13 Gratt. 118.

Plaintiff with No Title.—In an action of debt for rent, when the plea is nil debet, if the tenant has enjoyed the land uninterruptedly under the lease, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, whether he had a title to the land or not. Ross v. Gill, 1 Wash. 87.

Offset of Damages for Failure to Repair.—If a landlord covenants to make repairs to premises, the tenant may notify him to do so, and if he fails or refuses to comply with such covenant, the tenant may make the repairs, and in an action of debt instituted by the landlord for the rent, may recoup the same as offsets or payment against the rent demanded. Cheuvront v. Bee, 44 W. Va. 103, 28 S. E. Rep. 751.

(1) Right to Distrain.

Where Note Given for Rent.—A landlord taking the negotiable note of his tenant for rent may not distrain or sue for the rent until the maturity and nonpayment of the note. Hornbrooks v. Lucas, 24 W. Va. 493.

Two Leases—Second Lessee Unable to Get Part of Premises.—When the same premises are demised to two different tenants, under separate leases, executed at different dates, if the lessee under the first lease is in possession of part of the premises, so that the lessee under the second lease cannot get possession thereof, then the second lease is void as to that part of the premises, and the lessor cannot distrain for a proportion of the rent. Tunis v. Grandy, 22 Gratt. 109.

Code 1873—Rent Unpaid—Liability—Year's Rent.—"One year's rent" and "a year's rent," are used in Code 1873, ch. 184, §§ 11, 12, to denote the amount of rent to be distrained for in the one case and to be paid, or secured in the other, and it matters not for what year it accrued. As long as any rent arising under the tenancy remains unpaid by the persons liable therefor, as soon as it becomes due the persons entitled to it may distrain the goods for an amount not exceeding the rent for a year. Wades v. Figgatt, 75 Va. 575.

(2) Property Liable.

Must Be on Premises.—A distress for rent cannot be made off the demised premises, and in such case an attachment will be preferred to it. Mosby v. Leeds, 3 Call 439. See Geiger v. Harman, 3 Gratt. 180.

Same—Property of Stranger—Revised Code.—It was held in Davis v. Payne, 4 Rand. 332, that the property of a third person never was liable to distress for the rent of the tenant, unless it were found upon the premises; and even where it was found there, the distress was taken away by Act 1818, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 113, § 15.

Exception—Conveyance by Trust Deed of Property on Premises.—A tenant, having household furniture on the leased premises, conveyed it by deed of trust to trustees for payment of just debts; but the goods remained in possession of the tenant on the premises, and the lessor distrained them for rent in arrear. These goods were not exempted from distress within the meaning of 1 Rev. Code, ch. 113, § 15. Harvie v. Wickham, 6 Leigh 236.

(3) Proceedings to Distrain.

(a) Constitutionality.—In Anderson v. Henry, 45 W. Va. 319, 31 S. E. Rep. 998, the 14th amendment to the federal constitution was held not to render the local statute allowing distress for rent unconstitutional and void.

(b) Warrant and Affidavit.

Warrant Must Be in Name of State.—A warrant of distress is a writ, within the meaning of the constitutional provision requiring writs to run in the name of the state. Beach v. O'Riley, 14 W. Va. 55.

Certainty in Describing Premises.—A distress warrant ought not to be quashed for uncertainty in describing leased premises, where the description was: "A certain messuage and tenement situated in the city of Huntington, in Cabell county, West Virginia, rented by the Central Land Company to F. J. Calhoun,"—it not being necessary to describe the premises in such a case as is necessary in case of a conveyance. Central Land Co. v. Calhoun, 16 W. Va. 361.

Returned to Circuit Court—Dismissed by Plaintiff—Same Pleadings Proper in County Court.—Rent reserved in salt being in arrear the landlord distrained therefor, and the affidavit and warrant were returned to the circuit court, where the tenant appeared and a jury was impaneled to find the value of the rent in money; but not being able to agree they were discharged, and the landlord dismissed the case. Using the same affidavit and warrant he applied to the county court to ascertain the value, which course was regular. See 1 Rev. Code, ch. 113, § 12, p. 449; Brooks v. Wilcox, 11 Gratt. 411.

(c) Hearing and Determination.

Object in Proceeding before Jury.—The only object of proceeding before a jury in the case of a distress for rent, is to ascertain the value in money of the rent in arrear. It is not necessary for the landlord to prove to the jury that a distress warrant has been levied for rent in something other than money, and that it is due and in arrear. Brooks v. Wilcox, 11 Gratt. 411.

Jury Sworn to Find Rent "Said to Be Due."—In an action of distress for rent, where a jury was impaneled to ascertain the value of the rent in arrears in money, it was not error to swear the jury to ascertain the value of the rent said to be due. Brooks v. Wilcox, 11 Gratt. 411.

(d) Levy.

Officer May Make Second Levy.—An officer levying a distress warrant, if he thinks he has not taken sufficient effects to satisfy the claims for rent, may make a second levy. Brooks v. Wilcox, 11 Gratt. 411.

(e) Sale.

By Proper Officer.—Property distrained for rent can be sold only by an officer duly qualified as such, as by a sheriff or constable. Ferguson v. Moore, 2 Wash. 54.

Landlord Cannot Sell—Property a Pledge.—Although a landlord may levy a distress warrant personally or by means of an agent, he cannot sell the distrained effects, which in such case are only to be held as a pledge to compel the tenant to pay the rent. Smith v. Ambler, 1 Munf. 596.

Surplus Belongs to Tenant.—In a proceeding by distress for recovery of rent, under ch. 113, 1 Rev. Code 1819, where the value of rent in arrear has been found by the jury, and the court orders an officer to sell the property distrained, the proceeds of the sale after the deduction of the rent, interest and costs, should be turned over to the tenant. Brooks v. Wilcox, 11 Gratt. 411.

(f) Bonds.

Where Returnable.—A bond to release property distrained for rent must be returned to the court to which the officer levying the distress belongs or to the court of that county in which the land lies. Ferguson v. Moore, 2 Wash. 54. See generally, monographic notes on "Bonds" appended to Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 801, and "Statutory Bonds" appended to Goolsby v. Strother, 21 Gratt. 107.

Execution by Original Lessee Not in Possession.—A replevy bond given in a distress proceeding is good if executed by the original lessee, though he is not the tenant in actual possession, nor the owner of the property distrained, if he had assigned his lease to a third person, without the privity or assent of the lessor. Ferguson v. Moore, 2 Wash. 54.

Remedy on—Taken by Proper Officer.—A landlord is not entitled to the summary remedy by motion on a three months' replevin bond, unless it appear that such bond was taken by the sheriff or other officer legally authorized to make distress and sell the distrained effects. Smith v. Ambler, 1 Munf. 506.

Same—When Distress for More Rent Than Due.—A landlord may recover on a forthcoming bond given on a distress warrant for rent, though the warrant of distress was for more rent than was due. Carter v. Grant, 32 Gratt. 760.

Same—Contract of Rent Must Be Proved.—In summary proceedings on a forthcoming bond given on distress for rent, the plaintiff must prove the contract of rent for which the distress was sued out. Carter v. Grant, 32 Gratt. 760.

Same—Defenses.—In an action of debt on a forthcoming bond, for property levied on a distress warrant, the tenant may plead and show in defense that the distress was for rent not due from him at the time of suing out the distress warrant mentioned in the bond, since § 5, ch. 142, of the Code, expressly allows such defense. Hall v. Wadsworth, 35 W. Va. 375, 14 S. E. Rep. 4.

If the defendant in a motion on a forthcoming bond appears and makes defense, and the plaintiff proves the execution of the bond and its forfeiture, on demurrer to the evidence judgment should be given for the plaintiff, though he fail to produce or prove the distress warrant on which the bond was based. Central Land Co. v. Calhoun, 16 W. Va. 361.

Payable to Agent of Creditor—Good as Common-Law Bond.—A forthcoming bond for property levied on under a distress warrant, § 1, ch. 142, of the Code, providing that the officer levying a distress warrant may take from the debtor a bond, etc., "payable to the creditor," is not good as a statutory bond, if made payable to one as agent of the creditor; but it may be upheld as a good common-law bond in an action of debt thereon, when the obligor has enjoyed benefits under it. Hall v. Wadsworth, 35 W. Va. 375, 14 S. E. Rep. 4.

(4) Wrongful Distress.

Declaration—Allegations.—In an action under 1 Rev. Code, ch. 118, § 5, for wrongful distress for rent when no rent is in arrear, the declaration must set forth the relation of landlord and tenant existing between the plaintiff and the defendant, otherwise it is bad on general demurrer. Jones v. Murdaugh, 3 Leigh 447.

Same—Same—Variance.—In an action on the case for wrongful distress, the plaintiff alleged that he held under a lease for five months for twenty dollars payable in repairs and labor. It appeared at the trial that the lease was for twelve months and for money rent of sixty-five dollars. The variance was fatal. Olinger v. McChesney, 7 Leigh 660.

Same—Same—Compensatory Damages.—In an action under § 2808, Va. Code 1887, for damages on account of illegal distress for rent, the declaration alleged that the defendant levied on $975 of goods to satisfy a claim for rent amounting to $400, and that in fact there was no rent due, and that the plaintiff thereby incurred expenses and losses by reason of being deprived of gains in his business. There being no allegation showing circumstances of aggravation, only compensatory damages could be recovered. Fishburne v. Engledove, 91 Va. 548, 23 S. E. Rep. 354.

Goods Not Sold—Trespass and Case May Both Be Brought.—Where a distress is made for rent pretended to be due, when there is none due, and the goods distrained are not sold, the remedy is by action at common law, and trespass may be maintained. But the party suing is not obliged to bring trespass, as he may waive the trespass and bring case. Olinger v. McChesney, 7 Leigh 660.

Replevin Sued Out and Not Prosecuted Will Not Prevent Action on the Case.—Where there is a wrongful distress, the fact that the party distrained upon sued out a writ of replevin which was never prosecuted, will not prevent him from maintaining case for the wrongful distress. Case will lie for suing out an attachment for rent maliciously and without probable cause. Olinger v. McChesney, 7 Leigh 660.

No Relief in Equity but by Damages at Law.—Where a landlord distrains property as being fraudulently removed from the premises, and does not show that it was so fraudulently removed, nor that the distress is levied within the time allowed by law, nor that the property ever was on the demised premises, the tenant ought not to seek redress in a court of equity but by damages at law. Davis v. Payne, 4 Rand. 332.

X. ACTIONS IN GENERAL.

See section "IX. Rent," sub-section "9. Recovery."

1. LANDLORD AGAINST TENANT.

a. TO RECOVER POSSESSION.

Landlord Proper Plaintiff.—A landlord sells land in possession of his tenant by agreement under seal and the tenant refuses to deliver possession. The landlord is the proper party to institute proceedings to obtain possession. Harrison v. Middleton, 11 Gratt. 527. See Hawkins v. Wilson, 1 W. Va. 121. See generally, monographic note on "Unlawful Detainer" appended to Dobson v. Culpepper, 23 Gratt. 352.

Recovery According to Description in Warrant or Lease.—Plaintiff in action for unlawful detainer may recover according to description of the premises in his warrant or in the lease under which the defendant received possession from him, and must, at his peril, point out the premises to the sheriff, being compelled to make restitution if he takes more than he has recovered. Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 220.

Recovery of Entire Premises—Not Merely Part Occupied.—Lessor may recover entire premises demised, and not merely the part actually occupied by the defendants, in an action for unlawful detainer against his tenant holding over and disclaiming to hold under him. Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Gratt. 220.

Same—Alienation by Tenant.—Tenant alienating part or all of premises remains liable to his lessor in an action to recover possession of the whole premises, if possession be withheld after termination of the tenancy, whether such alienation be by sub-lease or by conveyance in fee with warranty.

and whether the act be ejectment or unlawful detainer. Emerick v. Tavenor, 9 Gratt. 220.

Defenses—Forfeiture for Taxes during Tenancy.—The fact that during the tenancy the title of the landlord has been forfeited for the nonpayment of taxes on the land in controversy constitutes no valid defense to an action of unlawful detainer, brought to dispossess the tenant, as the plaintiff is entitled to be placed in statu quo, unless, perhaps, the tenant has made a distinct disclaimer, and has been holding adversely for more than three years, or can sustain some other valid defense. Voss v. King, 38 W. Va. 607, 18 S. E. Rep. 762.

Same—Conveyance by Landlord during Term.—Although a tenant cannot deny his landlord's title at the time of the lease, he can show that subsequently the landlord has conveyed the land to another, in an action of unlawful detainer against the tenant for possession. Dobson v. Culpepper, 23 Gratt. 352.

Same—Lease Signed by Mistake Due to Fraud of Lessor.—In an action of unlawful detainer to recover possession of leased land, the lessee admits a lease, claiming that he signed it through mistake, that he was put in possession, erroneously supposing the landlord to have the better title, when as a matter of fact he himself was entitled to the land. It was held that if such mistake was induced by the fraudulent representations of the lessor, the lessee was entitled to such defence. Locke v. Frasher, 79 Va. 409.

b. TO RECOVER DAMAGES.

Abandonment of Lease—Amount of Damages.—If a lease is abandoned by the lessee, and he refuses to complete his contract, and after due notice the lessor sells the lease at public auction, damages may be recovered at once for the whole loss, and not merely for the loss up to the time of the sale. James v. Kibler, 94 Va. 165, 26 S. E. Rep. 417.

Same—Purchase by Lessor at Auction.—If the lessor, at a public auction of a lease which has been abandoned by the lessee, purchases the same, this will not prevent a recovery of damages by him for the breach of the contract. James v. Kibler, 94 Va. 165, 26 S. E. Rep. 417.

Failure to Develop Premises According to Contract.—The remedy of the lessor of land for oil and gas purposes for the failure on the part of the lessee to develop the leased premises according to the contract, or to protect it from drainage from wells on adjacent property, is ordinarily by an action at law for damages. Harness v. Eastern Oil Co., 49 W. Va. 232, 38 S. E. Rep. 662.

Permanent Injury Due to Negligence.—Where premises are permanently injured by the negligence of the lessee, an action on the case may be brought by the lessor pending the lease, and the action will not be prevented by a covenant of the lessee to have the premises in good repair. It is not for the tenant to say that an action of covenant may be maintained against him for the same cause; for the lessor may have at his option either remedy. Moses v. Old Dominion, etc., Co., 75 Va. 95.

Assumpsit — Breach of Covenant — Allegations.—Where an action of assumpsit is brought for damages for the violation of a covenant in a lease which provided for its renewal and which was conditioned on the performance of the terms of the lease, the lessee must allege a performance of such conditions, or a valid excuse for nonperformance. Grubb v. Burford, 98 Va. 553, 37 S. E. Rep. 4, citing Carroll Co. v. Collier, 23 Gratt. 302, 308; Metropolitan L.

Ins. Co. v. Rutherford, 95 Va. 773, 30 S. E. Rep. 383, and authorities there cited.

Covenant to Keep in Repair—Damage by Lessee's Negligence—Repairs by Lessor and New Lease—Liability of Lessee.—The lessor in a lease of a warehouse for three years covenanted that if the building should be so damaged by fire, or other cause as to make it untenable, the lease should be void, and the lessee covenanted to leave the building in good repair, ordinary wear and tear excepted. The lessee stored in the building a large quantity of iron and nails, and during a storm a portion of the building, including all the floors and the roof, fell down. The lessor claimed that the lessee was liable for damages, which the latter denied, and the former with the latter's consent, repaired the building, and the lessee again took possession and held under the lease. It was held that the lessor could sue in an action on the case against the lessee for the damage done to the building. Moses v. Old Dominion, etc., Co., 75 Va. 95.

Same—Measure of Damages.—In an action on the case by a landlord against his tenant for damages to a building, which the latter had covenanted to keep in repair, on refusal of the latter to repair, and the building having been repaired by the landlord with the tenant's consent, the measure of damages is what was necessarily expended in placing the property in its former condition. Moses v. Old Dominion, etc., Co., 75 Va. 95.

c. FOR INJUNCTION.—See monographic note on "Injunctions" appended to Clayton v. Anthony, 15 Gratt. 518.

Restrictions in Lease—Irreparable Injury.—When the lessee is restricted by the terms of his lease to a particular use of the premises, as a general rule equity will restrain him from using them in any other way, even though no irreparable injury will result from such other use. Frank & Co. v. Brunnemann, 8 W. Va. 462.

Same—Waste — Implied Agreement.—A court of equity will enjoin a tenant from doing a certain act, whether it is waste or not, if it be directly contrary to the tenant's covenant, or even contrary to an implied agreement which is inferred from the course of dealing between the parties. Frank & Co. v. Brunnemann, 8 W. Va. 462.

Enjoining Waste—Dissolution of Order.—An order dissolving an injunction to restrain a lessee from erecting a stable on the leased premises without the consent of the lessor, is not erroneous, it providing that the stable should be removed at the expiration of the lease, should the lessor so insist, it being erected against her will. Hubble v. Cole, 85 Va. 87, 7 S. E. Rep. 242.

2. LANDLORD AGAINST THIRD PERSONS.

Officer Removing Goods without Paying Rent—Damages.—An officer under execution removes goods of a lessee without paying the rent due to the landlord. In an action by the landlord against the officer the just measure of damages is the value of the goods and not the amount of rent in arrears. Crawford v. Jarrett, 2 Leigh 630.

3. THIRD PERSONS AGAINST LANDLORD.

Injury to Water Power by Erection of Boom.—A lessor who erects a boom in such close proximity to a milldam as to injure the water power of such dam, and thereby creates a nuisance against the same, is equally liable with his lessee with notice for the continuance of such nuisance. Pickens v. Coal, etc., Co. (W. Va.), 41 S. E. Rep. 400.

Purchase of Salt—Possession Taken by Lessor—Destruction.—The owner of a salt factory leased it, reserving rent in salt. In July the lessee sold to a third person all the salt then made, or that should be made before the next January, except what would be due the landlord for rent. The purchaser sent for the salt early in December. A boat of it being loaded, and being on the point of starting, the landlord forbade its being taken away, declaring he would warrant it for the rent. The sheriff then came, saying he had a warrant, and forbade the removal of the salt and the boatman left. The landlord took possession, and sent the boat down the river, where it was sunk. In an action of trover by the purchaser against the landlord, it was held that the salt belonged to the purchaser. Lewis v. Arnold, 13 Gratt. 454.

4. TENANT AGAINST LANDLORD.

Injunction to Enjoyment of Land—Action on Bond—Covenant.—Where the lessor prevents the lessee from enjoying the leased property by preliminary injunction which is afterwards dissolved, the fact that the lessee has a right of action on the injunction bond will not bar his action of covenant. Hubble v. Cole, 88 Va. 236, 13 S. E. Rep. 441, 29 Am. St. Rep. 716, 13 L. R. A. 311.

Same—Same—"Case."—An injunction restraining a tenant from enjoying the leased premises was dissolved. The tenant may recover damages by action on the case, in addition to his remedy on the injunction bond. Hubble v. Cole, 88 Va. 236, 13 S. E. Rep. 441.

Failure to Deliver Possession—Ejectment—Measure of Damages.—In an action for damages for failure of the landlord to give possession of property which had been leased, or from which he has ejected the tenant, where the gist of the action is the deprivation of the benefit of the lease, whether the action is covenant or tort, the general rule is that the plaintiff is entitled, as the measure of the damages, to the difference between the rent reserved and the value of the premises for the term. He may also recover such special damages as have directly and necessarily been occasioned by defendant's wrongful act or default, but cannot recover what he might have made on the premises during his lease, nor for loss sustained by selling his stock, implements, etc., for less than their value. Robrecht v. Marling, 29 W. Va. 765, 2 S. E. Rep. 827.

The plaintiff rented a mill from the defendant, but possession was not delivered. No special damage being shown, the court held that the plaintiff in an action of covenant is entitled to recover only the difference between the rent contracted to be paid and a fair rent for the property at the time it should have been delivered. Newbrough v. Walker, 8 Gratt. 16, 56 Am. Dec. 127.

Specific Performance.—An executory lease that is unfair, unjust or unreasonable will not be enforced in equity. Eclipse Oil Co. v. South Penn Oil Co., 47 W. Va. 84, 34 S. E. Rep. 923.

5. TENANT AGAINST THIRD PERSONS.

Trespass—Tenant Proper Plaintiff.—An action of trespass against a stranger should be brought by the tenant, and not by the landlord. Kretzer v. Wysong, 5 Gratt. 9.

Damage to Property—Measure of.—A life tenant in possession is entitled to sue for damages done the property, by which the rental value thereof is diminished or destroyed. The measure of damages, as in other cases, is the amount necessary to make good the loss, which must be determined by the jury from the facts and circumstances shown in evidence. Johnson v. Chapman, 43 W. Va. 639, 26 S. E. Rep. 744.

Injunction to Waste.—A person holding a valid executory oil and gas lease, executed by several of a number of cotenants, is such an inchoate interest in the land subject to such lease as will enable him to maintain an injunction to prevent a wrongdoer from committing waste by the extraction of such oil and gas. Trees v. Eclipse Oil Co., 47 W. Va. 107, 34 S. E. Rep. 933. See monographic note on "Injunctions" appended to Claytor v. Anthony, 15 Gratt. 518.

Contract between Landlord and Railroad—Violation—Who Can Sue.—Where a landowner makes a contract with a railroad company to fence its right of way through his lands, and subsequently the landowner leases for a year to a tenant, and at date of lease the fence was in bad condition, and down in several places, the tenant cannot maintain an action for damages on the contract. Hoyleman v. Kanawha, etc., R. Co., 33 W. Va. 489, 10 S. E. Rep. 816.

XI. EVIDENCE.

Sufficiency to Establish Lease.—A party who had signed an agreement to lease, told a third person that he had rented his property, and requested him not to say anything about it, presumably because he did not want it known until it was all arranged. This evidence was held insufficient to prove the writing to be an actual lease. Boisacau v. Fuller, 96 Va. 45, 30 S. E. Rep. 457.

Admissibility—Action to Recover Rent—Destruction of Buildings.—Where an action of debt is brought to recover rent for leased buildings, it is admissible evidence to show the destruction of the buildings, which occurred without the fault of the lessee, as this exonerates him from the payment of the rent, by § 2455 of the Code. Richmond Ice Co. v. Crystal Ice Co., 99 Va. 239, 37 S. E. Rep. 851.

Same—Same—Occupation by Unsealed Lease.—In an action of assumpsit for use and occupation of land, occupation by permission of the plaintiff may be proved directly by the production and proof of a written lease, not under seal, if one has been entered into. Goshorn v. Steward, 15 W. Va. 657.

Same—Same—Amount of Recovery by Unsealed Lease.—In an action of assumpsit for the use and occupation of land, the agreement not being under seal and being fully executed on the part of the plaintiff, he is entitled to introduce the written agreement, which fixes the rent, in evidence of the amount of recovery in the action. Goshorn v. Steward, 15 W. Va. 657.

Same—Same—Same—Nonsuit.—Where an action of assumpsit is brought for the use and occupation of a tract of land, and the declaration contains only two counts, one of which is indebitatus assumpsit, and the other on the quantum meruit, and a bill of particulars is filed with the declaration, if the defendants interpose the plea of nonassumpsit for five years, although a written agreement not under seal may appear in evidence, fixing the terms of the rental for one year, when the possession and occupancy continue for nearly six years thereafter, under the West Virginia statute, the plaintiff shall not be nonsuited by reason of the writing appearing in evidence, but the same may be considered in fixing the value of the rental. Atkinson v. Winters, 47 W. Va. 226, 34 S. E. Rep. 834.

Same—Same—To Prove Owner.—In an action of debt on a bond given for the lease of certain premises, evidence is admissible to prove who is in fact the true owner of the land. Barley v. Barley, 1 Va. Dec. 103.

Same—Parol Evidence to Explain Lease.—Parol evidence of a usage for the off-going tenant to have the way-going crop is not admissible to explain a written contract of lease for a fixed and certain period. Harris v. Carson, 7 Leigh 632.

Same—Same—Inconsistent with.—Where a lessee had, by his written contract with the lessor, until the end of his term to make certain repairs to the property, a verbal agreement to make them at an earlier period is inconsistent with the written contract, and therefore does not come within the exception to the rule that parol evidence may be introduced when it establishes an agreement additional to but consistent with the written agreement. Colhoun v. Wilson, 27 Gratt. 639.

Same—Same—What Included in Lease.—If it cannot be ascertained by the written contract of lease whether a parcel of the demised premises is included therein, it is permissible to show this by extrinsic evidence. Crawford v. Morr, 5 Gratt. 90.

Same—Action on Covenant to Renew—Future Profits—Damages.—In an action for the breach of a covenant to renew a lease, evidence of the future profits to be made from the property, if a certain price can be obtained for the product thereof, is inadmissible on the question of damages. Grubb v. Burford, 98 Va. 553, 37 S. E. Rep. 4.

Same—Same—Parol Evidence to Modify Lease—Later Lease.—In an action of assumpsit for damages for failure to renew a lease, where the plaintiff had introduced evidence that a certain lease had been modified by a parol agreement, and it was denied by the defendant, it was error to refuse to admit a later lease between the parties, which provided that it should not conflict or interfere with the lease sued on, to rebut such evidence. Grubb v. Burford, 98 Va. 553, 37 S. E. Rep. 4.

Presumption of Payment—Evidence to Repel—Endorsement on Bond.*—An endorsement of credit on a bond, made by the obligee within the period that raises the legal presumption of payment, is evidence for him for the purpose of repelling that presumption.

Presumption of Payment—Evidence to Repel—Endorsement on Bond.—The principal case is cited in Sadler v. Kennedy, 11 W. Va. 193, for the proposition that an endorsement on a bond for payment on account of the principal or interest, written by the obligee, without the privity of the debtor, will not be sufficient evidence of an acknowledgment, that the bond was then due, so as to repel the presumption of payment, unless it be proved by other evidence than the endorsement itself, that the same was written at a time, when its operation was against the interest of the party making it; that is to say, before the presumption of payment attached. See Coles v. Ballard, 78 Va. 139.

In Sadler v. Kennedy, 11 W. Va. 193, the court, in referring to the decision in the principal case, said: "In that case the endorsements on the bond were proven to have been made by the obligee; but there was no evidence tending to show that the payments were actually made, other than the endorsements, nor at what time the endorsements were in fact made by the obligee; but the evidence showed, that the obligee in fact died about thirteen years after the bond was due."

Same—Same—Same—Case at Bar.—In an action of debt brought in 1837 by an administrator against an executor, upon a bond of the 10th of January 1833, payable the first of January 1834, the defendant offered as a setoff a bond of the plaintiff's intestate to the defendant's testator, dated the 5th of April 1820 and payable on demand, with two endorsements thereon, admitted by the plaintiff to be in the handwriting of the defendant's testator, one of which credited a sum paid in part on the first of June 1828, and the other credited another payment in part on the 5th of May 1829. The circuit court, at the instance of the plaintiff, instructed the jury, that after the lapse of 16 years from the date of said bond, the jury might, from this aided by other circumstances, presume it paid; and, at the instance of the defendant, instructed the jury, that such presumption of payment might be repelled by other circumstances. The defendant relying upon the endorsements aforesaid upon the bond, and there being no proof of the time at which they were made, except that it appeared the defendant's testator died in 1833, the circuit court, at the instance of the plaintiff, instructed the jury, that the said endorsements were not circumstances to be taken into consideration by the jury to repel the presumption. HELD, as the endorsements must have been made within the period of about 18 years from the time the bond was due, the circuit court clearly erred in its last instruction.

The administrator of Jane Dabney, in the early part of 1837, brought an action of debt in the circuit court of Louisa against the executors of Charles Dabney, upon a bond for 140 dollars, made the 10th of January 1833 and payable on the first of January 1834. Issue was joined on the plea of payment.

Same—Same—Examples of Repelling Evidence.—The common-law rule of presumption of payment may be repelled by satisfactory evidence of any kind whatever to the contrary. For example: By the obligor's express admissions, within the twenty years, that the debt was unpaid; by his implied admissions to that effect, from paying interest, or part of the principal, which fact is proved by extrinsic evidence, or even by contemporaneous endorsement by the obligee himself; or by showing the obligor's inability to pay during the period; or by suspension of power of collection by stay-law, or by war, or even by the near relationship of the parties. Udike v. Lane, 78 Va. 136, citing Carll v. Hart, 15 Barbour 567; Dabney v. Dabney, 2 Rob. 650; 2 Min. Inst. 758; 4 Min. Inst. 502; 1 Rob. Pr. (2d Ed.) 622; Hutsonpiller v. Stover, 12 Gratt. 579; Erskine v. North, 14 Gratt. 60. Those rules obtained as well in courts of equity as at law.

The principal case is cited in this connection in Norvell v. Little, 79 Va. 144, and in foot-note to Erskine v. North, 14 Gratt. 61. See Criss v. Criss, 28 W. Va. 388; Hale v. Pack, 10 W. Va. 145; Eustace v. Gaskins, 1 Wash 188; Bowie v. Poor School Soc., 75 Va. 300; McCleary v. Grantham, 29 W. Va. 301, 11 S. E. Rep. 949.

623 *At the trial in September 1839, the defendants offered in evidence, as a setoff, a bond of Jane Dabney to C. W. Dabney, dated the 5th of April 1820, for 130 dollars 33 cents payable on demand, with the following endorsements on it: "June 1st 1828. Received in part this note 26 dollars 78 cents. Cha. Dabney jr." "May 5, 1829. Rec'd 45 dollars in part this note. C. Dabney jr." These endorsements were admitted by the plaintiff to be in the handwriting of the testator of the defendants, and the defendants proved by a witness that their testator died in 1833, previous to the 11th of November in that year; but there was no other evidence of the time at which the said endorsements were made, and it did not appear that they were made with the knowledge or assent of the plaintiff's intestate. The court, at the instance of the counsel for the plaintiff, instructed the jury, that after the lapse of 16 years from the date of said bond, the jury, from this aided by other circumstances, might presume it paid. At the instance of the counsel for the defendants, the court also instructed the jury, that such presumption of payment might be repelled by other circumstances. In this state of the case, the counsel for the plaintiff moved the court to instruct the jury, that the endorsements aforesaid upon the bond were not circumstances to be taken into consideration by the jury to repel such presumption; and the court gave this instruction, to which the defendants excepted.

A verdict was found for the plaintiff for 106 dollars 98 cents, with interest from the first of January 1834; and judgment was rendered thereupon.

To this judgment a supersedeas was awarded.

The cause was argued by Grattan for the plaintiffs in error, and C. and G. N. Johnson for defendant in error.

624 *BALDWIN, J. An endorsement of credit on a bond, made by the obligee within the period that raises the legal presumption of payment, is evidence for him for the purpose of repelling that presumption. This exception from the general rule that a man's declarations shall not be evidence in his own behalf is justified by peculiar considerations. The evidence is used not to establish an original demand, but merely to rebut a presumption. The presumption thus met arises out of the imputed conduct of the obligee, to wit, his forbearing to assert his demand for many years; and the fact that he obtained a partial payment during the time goes to shew that the imputation is unfounded. The evidence of the fact, it is true, is furnished by the party himself; but it proceeded from him at a time when the disclosure was against his own interest. It is evidence, too, which he had authority at the time to establish, and which it was his duty to establish, for the protection of the obligor; and after a considerable lapse of time, it is usually the only available means of shewing the negative of nonpayment, by the affirmative of partial payment. Upon the whole, therefore, such evidence is just, reasonable and expedient, unless attended with too much danger of fraud; and that is sufficiently guarded against by requiring proof that the endorsement was made within the period of presumption, and consequently when it was against the interest of the obligee to make it. Ingenuity, it is true, may still suggest a complexity of circumstances rendering such a fraud advantageous to the obligee; but that is a mere possibility, and the rules of evidence must deal with probabilities.

The first decision we have upon this subject is that of Searle v. Lord Barrington, of which there are several reports; 2 Str. 826; 2 Ld. Raym. 1370; 8 Mod. 278; 3 Bro. P. C. (old ed.) 535. In that case, which was an action upon a bond due in 1697, the defendant *pleaded solvit ad diem, and relied upon the presumption, it being after twenty years; to encounter which, the plaintiff offered to give in evidence an endorsement of interest under the hand of the obligee in the year 1707, which evidence was objected to, but received, and a verdict and judgment rendered for the plaintiff; which judgment was affirmed in parliament. It seems, from the reports of the case, that the endorsement bore date in 1707, but none of them state that there was proof of its having been actually made at that time. Whether in point of fact there was such proof, is a matter about which there has been a contrariety of opinion: 1 Starkie on Evid. pt. 2, p. 311, note (f.); 1 Phill. on Evid. 5th american from 8th Lond. ed. [349]; Turner v. Crisp, 2 Str. 827; Glyn v. Bank of England, 2 Ves. sen. 43; Roseboom v. Billington, 17 Johns. R. 182. That, however, I regard now as mere matter of curious speculation; for it is unimportant whether the decision in Searle v. Lord Barrington is to be considered as so restrained by the facts before the court in that cause, as to require proof that the endorsement was actually made within the period of presumption; or whether its authority is to be regarded as so limited by subsequent adjudications. It is certain that the principle of the case, so restricted, has been since uniformly recognized: see the authorities above cited, and Rose v. Bryant, 2 Camp. 321.

There can be no difficulty in the application of this doctrine to the case before us. The endorsements in question are in the handwriting of the obligee, who died in the year 1833. The bond is dated in 1820, and payable on demand. Of course the endorsements were made within the period of about thirteen years from the time when the bond was due. The general rule is therefore applicable, unless there be something in the peculiar circumstances of this case to constitute an exception.

626 *It has not been and cannot be supposed, that the aspect of the case is at all varied by the circumstances that the bond in question was introduced as a setoff to the bond sued upon by the plaintiff, instead of having been made the foundation of a separate action. It is equally immaterial, as I conceive, that the bond sued upon is of a subsequent period to the one in question, having been executed in January 1833, and payable in January 1834. This, I think, will be obvious by attending to the precise proposition we are called upon to determine.

The court, at the instance of the plaintiff, instructed the jury, that after the lapse of sixteen years from the date of the bond in question, aided by other circumstances, the jury might presume it paid. Then, at the instance of the defendants, the court instructed the jury, that such presumption of payment might be repelled by other circumstances. Thereupon the plaintiff moved the court for a further instruction, that the endorsements on the bond were not to be taken into consideration by the jury to repel such presumption; which instruction the court gave. And it is upon the propriety of this last instruction that we are called upon to decide.

It will be observed, that the plaintiff relied upon circumstances not as distinct and substantive evidence, but merely to eke out a lapse of time inadequate in itself to raise the presumption of payment; the whole to constitute a substitute for the complete legal presumption presented by the lapse of twenty years. It was therefore a mere presumption which the defendants had to meet, and whether a presumption arising exclusively from the lapse of time, or from the lapse of time aided by circumstances, I regard as wholly immaterial. Besides, if this were not so, it is impossible to say that the defendants had a right to rely upon the endorsements to encounter a lapse 627 of twenty years, *but not of only sixteen years; and if the right be the same in both instances, then it cannot be objected, in regard to the latter, that the effect would be to leave the subsidiary circumstances to their own intrinsic and independent weight.

The circumstances that the bond sued upon is posterior in date to the one introduced as a setoff, furnished no legal presumption of the payments of the latter; though it was evidence which the plaintiff had a right to rely upon, in connexion with other evidence, to prove the fact of payment, or, in connexion with the lapse of time, to raise the presumption of payment. If used at the trial in the latter point of view, as it probably was, it did not warrant the court in withholding the endorsements from the consideration of the jury, as evidence to repel the presumption of payment. Though there may have been a presumption to repel at the time of the trial, there was none when the endorsements were made. It must be taken, therefore, that they were made when it was against the obligee's own interest to make them, unless we admit the gratuitous supposition that they were fraudulently contrived to be used at some future period, when a presumption of payment might arise. Such a fraud is the proper subject of proof, not of conjecture; and the plaintiff was at liberty to prove it, if he could, before the jury.

My opinion therefore is, that the circuit court erred in its last instruction to the jury; for which error the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial awarded, with a direction that upon such new trial the instruction is not to be repeated.

STANARD, J., and CABELL, P., concurring, judgment accordingly reversed, and new trial awarded, with a direction that the last instruction was not to be repeated.

Executors and Administrators*—Set-Off of Distributee's Share against Purchases.—The rule laid down in Pulliam v. Winston &c., 5 Leigh 324, that a distributee purchasing at an administrator's sale cannot injoin the collection of the bond for his purchases until his distributive share is ascertained and set off against the bond, approved as a general one; but an exception to it recognized.

Same—Injunction by Distributee's Donee of a Slave to Sale under Execution for Debt of Distributee of Estate—Set-Off of Distributable Share against Judgment—Parties—Case at Bar.—In November 1815, at a sale by an executor on 12 months credit, a distributee was one of the purchasers. The person requested to be her surety manifesting some reluctance to become such, the executor assured him that there was no danger of his having any thing to pay, as the purchases by the distributee were not so much as her portion of the estate. Whereupon the bond was executed. The executor died in 1821, and there was immediate administration on his estate, and on that of the first testator; but no suit was brought on the bond till 1827. Judgment was then obtained on it: and in the same year some of the legatees brought a suit for a settlement of the executorship account. In 1832, the distributee acquired slaves by the death of her father, and made a voluntary conveyance of them. One of them was sold under execution upon the judgment, and purchased by the administrator de bonis non at the sheriff's sale. Two others being afterwards levied on, the donee filed a bill in 1838 against the judgment creditor, to restrain the sale. During all this time there was no settlement of the executorship account: and none took place until the administrator of the executor was coerced to settle, by attachments for his contempt in disobeying the orders of the court in the suit of the legatees. HOLD. 1. On the donee's bill, an injunction may be awarded to restrain the sale of the two slaves levied on, until the amount of the distributee's claim is ascertained; and when ascertained, the same may be set off against the judgment. 2. The distributee is an indispensable party to the donee's suit. 3. As a suit is pending in which all the other distributees are parties, there is no necessity to make them parties in the donee's suit, but the proper course is to retain the injunction until, by the adjustment of the account in the other suit, the amount of the distributee's claim is finally liquidated, and then to apply that amount as a setoff against the judgment. 4. It being ascertained that after allowing *credit for the entire claim of the distributee, she was indebted, at the time of the sale of the slaves first levied on, more than the amount for which he sold, the credit in respect to that slave cannot be enlarged to what is estimated as his value at the time of the sale, but must be limited to the amount made on the execution by the sale of him: dissentiente BALDWIN, J., on the last point.

Same—Settlement of Accounts—Widow's Interest as Distributee—Case at Bar.—A testator dies possessed of slaves, to a third of which his widow, who renounces his will, is entitled during her life. In a settlement of the executorship account after the death of the executor, and after the widow's death, it appears by the appraisement that the slaves were seven in number. Two were specifically bequeathed by the testator, and the presumption is that they were delivered over to the legatees. Two were sold under execution of a creditor of the testator, before the executor had other assets in hand to pay the execution, and were purchased by the executor at the sheriff's sale. And two others were sold by the executor, though the payment of debts did not require the sale of them if the widow had paid up a sum of 792 dollars 48 cents, due from her for purchases of the testator's goods. When or for what prices these two were sold, did not appear. The record furnished no information of the disposition of the seventh slave; but the probability is that he was old and of little or no value. HELD, the charge for the widow's interest in the slaves, instead of being measured by their estimated hires, should be an annual sum from the death of her husband until her death, equal to the annual interest of one third of the gross amount of the sales or the value of the slaves: dissentiente BALDWIN, J., who was of opinion that the widow was entitled to credit for one third annually of the estimated hires.

In 1815 Joseph Hickerson died, leaving a will by which he gave legacies to his children, and leaving a widow Elizabeth, who renounced the provision made for her by the will. His son Marshall Hickerson qualified as executor, and on the 9th and 10th of November 1816, made sale, on a credit of 12 months, of the perishable goods of his testator, and of some of the other personalty. Elizabeth Hickerson made purchases at this sale to the amount of 792 dollars 48 cents, and gave bond for the same with Daniel Hickerson as her surety. Marshall Hickerson died on the 3d of July 630 *1821 (while away from home) in Augusta in Georgia. In August of that year his brother Hosea qualified as his administrator, and as administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of Joseph Hickerson. In March 1827, the legatees of Joseph Hickerson brought a suit against the said Hosea (to which the said Elizabeth was made a party) for a settlement of the executorial accounts, and a distribution of the said Joseph's estate. About the same time an action appears to have been brought by the said Hosea, as administrator de bonis non, against mrs. Hickerson and her surety, upon the bond before mentioned: for, in June 1827, an office judgment was rendered against them. An execution on this judgment was returned by the sheriff without any part being made; and then no other execution issued for about five years.

In the mean time, proceedings were going on in the suit of the legatees, the style of which was Shumate &c. v. Hickerson &c. In that suit, on the 19th of May 1828, the defendant Hosea Hickerson was ordered to render an account of his administration on the estate of Marshall Hickerson; and on the 21st of September 1829, he was ordered to render, in addition, an account of his transactions as administrator de bonis non of Joseph Hickerson, and an account of Marshall Hickerson's transactions on the same estate. In May 1830, a rule was made upon the said Hosea to shew cause why he should not be attached for his contempt in failing to render the said accounts; which rule was made absolute on the 2d of October 1830: but on the 11th of the same month, upon an affidavit of the said Hosea, stating (among other things) that he had rendered an account to the commissioner as far as he was enabled to do so, the order making the rule absolute was set aside. Again, however, on the 16th of October 1830, an attachment was awarded, with a proviso that it was to be discharged upon the 631 said Hosea's appearing before *the commissioner, and answering interrogatories upon oath in relation to the said accounts.

On the 26th of March 1832, the will of James Parr was proved, whereby he gave to his daughter Elizabeth Hickerson a third of his slaves and a share of his other estate. A few days afterwards the following deed was made:

"Know all men by these presents, that I, Elizabeth Hickerson of the county of Fauquier and state of Virginia, for and in consideration of the several expenses and troubles that my son in law mr. Lina Helm has been at, and which may hereafter accrue, together with the natural love I bear towards his wife Jinsey Helm, have given and by these presents do give to my said son in law Lina Helm all right, title and claim that I have coming to me by a legacy from my father James Parr deceased. In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 29th day of March 1832.

On the 6th of April 1832, under an order made at March term, the slaves of James Parr were divided by commissioners among his legatees; upon which division there were allotted to Mrs. Hickerson, King valued at 300 dollars, Lucinda at 260 dollars, Hannah at 50 dollars, John at 80 dollars, and Dick at 25 cents. The division was returned to court the 28th of May 1832, and ordered to be recorded; and on the 23d of November 1832, the deed to Helm was acknowledged in the clerk's office, and admitted to record.

On the 19th of January 1833, an execution issued in favour of Hosea Hickerson, 632 as administrator, against *Mrs.

Hickerson and Daniel Hickerson her surety; but the county court quashed it, because Daniel Hickerson was dead at the time it was issued. A new execution was issued the 12th of April 1833, against Mrs. Hickerson alone, which was levied on the slave King. Hosea Hickerson gave an indemnifying bond to the sheriff, and the slave was sold for 325 dollars, the said Hosea becoming the purchaser. The sheriff returned that this was all the property he could find. But some time afterwards a new execution was sued out, which was levied upon two other slaves Lucinda and John.

Whereupon, to wit, on the 22d of July 1833, Lina Helm exhibited a bill to the judge of the circuit court of Fauquier, asserting that under the deed from Mrs. Hickerson he became entitled to certain property, part whereof consisted of Lucinda and John, who were delivered up by the executor of Parr in March 1832, and from that time until lately had been in the complainant's possession. The consideration of the deed, he alleged, was not only good but valuable; and he made the following statement concerning it. "The said Elizabeth, at the time of its execution, and for a length of time previously, was an inmate in your orator's family, and has been and is so living up to this moment. In maintaining, supporting and providing for the said Elizabeth, your orator had, prior to the execution of the said conveyance, encountered considerable expense, and has since encountered more. As some remuneration to your orator for the expenses thus incurred by him, as well as some indemnity for expected future expenses, the aforesaid conveyance was executed." The bill insisted that the deed invested the complainant with a good title against any creditors of the said Elizabeth (even if she had any). But the ground was further taken, that the said Hosea Hickerson was not entitled to enforce his judgment, even against the said Elizabeth.

For, it was alleged, her interest 633 *in the estate of Joseph Hickerson was more than her bond, and had been so stated by Marshall Hickerson. The bill, after detailing some circumstances in regard to the levy upon Lucinda and John, mentioned (in aggravation, as it would seem, of Hickerson's conduct) his course in regard to King; stating, that on the day of sale an injunction was granted to restrain the sale, but before the injunction bond could be executed and the process perfected, and after the sheriff was apprized of the injunction, the sale took place, at a price much below the actual value of the slave. "Thus then," the bill proceeded, "has your orator been deprived of one of the negroes already which he obtained under the aforesaid conveyance, and an attempt is now making to deprive him of the other two." The prayer was for an injunction to restrain Hickerson from selling the slaves, and for general relief.

The injunction was awarded.

Elizabeth Hickerson was no party to this bill. The defendant Hosea Hickerson answered, denying that the deed to Helm was upon valuable consideration, insisting that it was upon a consideration merely voluntary, and that the deed was in fact fraudulent, and made with the express intention of defeating the recovery of the debt due him. Marshall Hickerson, he said, had died suddenly while on a visit to a distant part of the union, and left his papers in great confusion, and the respondent had to encounter almost insuperable difficulties in the settlement of said estate. It was impossible, he thought, for any person, in the present state of the suit brought by the legatees, to form any thing like a correct estimate of the final result of that case. The whole amount of the debt due from the said Elizabeth might, and in all probability would, be required for the payment of debts. And he insisted that the regular collection of the assets of Joseph Hickerson's estate ought not to be interfered with. What was said in the 634 *bill in relation to King was noticed in the answer, and the defendant's conduct explained.

The deposition of Joseph Thompson was taken in 1835, to prove the understanding with Mrs. Hickerson at the time the bond was given. He recollected, he said, "that she was called on by the executor for security, and that Daniel Hickerson was applied to, to unite with Mrs. Hickerson in the bond. Mr. Hickerson seemed rather to decline binding himself, saying that there might be some difficulty; but the difficulty was overcome by the assurance given him by the executor, that there was no sort of danger of his having any thing to pay for the widow, that the purchases made by her would not amount to any thing like the portion of the estate she was entitled to."

Rodham Eskridge and Meredith Eskridge deposed, that after the injunction, Helm made sale of Lucinda and John.

There were many depositions in regard to the consideration of the deed to Helm, and evidence also as to the value of King at the time he was sold by the sheriff; some of the witnesses for the plaintiff considering him worth 500 dollars, and others for the defendant not placing him at a higher value than 325 dollars.

The suit of the legatees, which was originally brought in the superior court of chancery at Fredericksburg, and afterwards transferred to the circuit court of Spotsylvania, was removed by consent, in 1837, to the circuit court of Fauquier; and in February 1839, mrs. Hickerson having died, the same was revived against Lina Helm as her administrator.

In this suit there were filed as exhibits, the appraisement of the estate of Joseph Hickerson on the 9th of November 1815, amounting to 3136 dollars 64 cents, and the account of sales made on that and the next day, amounting to 1830 dollars 5 635 cents. This account *of sales did not include the slaves, the names and values of which were stated in the appraisement as follows: negro man Admiral 60 dollars, negro man Jack 450 dollars, negro boy Willis 400 dollars, negro woman Flora 300 dollars, negro girl Nelly 250 dollars, negro boy Landon 300 dollars, negro boy Alexander 300 dollars. Of these, Flora and Landon were specifically bequeathed by the testator. Nelly and Alexander were sold in April 1816 by the sheriff of Fauquier, under an execution against the estate of Joseph Hickerson, and purchased at the price of 544 dollars 50 cents by Marshall Hickerson. Jack and Willis were sold by Marshall Hickerson as executor, but the prices for which he sold them did not appear by any thing before the commissioner. And the commissioner, in stating the account of the said executor, charged him in 1816 with the sum for which Nelly and Alexander were sold, and with the appraised value of Jack and Willis.

So stating the account, the commissioner reported a balance due from Marshall Hickerson as executor of 4483 dollars 12 cents, with interest on 1909 dollars 71 cents part thereof from the first of January 1839, chargeable with the payment of a balance found due to Hosea Hickerson as administrator de bonis non of Joseph Hickerson (on the settlement of his administration account) of 652 dollars 65 cents, with interest on 537 dollars 2 cents part thereof from the first of January 1839 till paid, and chargeable also with a balance of a debt of Basil Gordon. The commissioner also settled the account of Hosea Hickerson as administrator of Marshall Hickerson, and reported a balance due from the said Hosea on this account. The commissioner's report was returned on the 2d of May 1839; and on the 10th of that month Hosea Hickerson paid to Basil Gordon the balance due him, amounting to 460 dollars 33 cents.

636 *There was an exception by Hosea Hickerson to the report, upon the ground that the execution under which Nelly and Alexander were sold was for more than the amount of sales. And the court, on the 20th of May 1839, recommitted the report to the commissioner, for him to make a statement shewing how the account would stand if Hosea Hickerson should now pay the balance due on the said execution. This was the last order in the case of Shumate v. Hickerson.

On the same 20th of May 1839, the court made an order in the case of Helm v. Hickerson, directing the commissioner to ascertain mrs. Hickerson's share of the perishable estate of Joseph Hickerson, and add thereto interest on one third of the value of his slaves. The court also directed the said commissioner to credit her distributive share with the execution enjoined, and to credit the execution with 500 dollars, which, in the opinion of the court, was the value of King at the time of sale.

The commissioner made a report whereby it appeared, that omitting the slaves, and charging Marshall Hickerson with the proceeds of all the other personalty (including mrs. Hickerson's own purchases) as if the amount had been received by the executor, the sum in his hands, as of the first of January 1839, was 1358 dollars 8 cents; and then deducting what was due to Hosea Hickerson, and the sum paid by him to Basil Gordon, the balance was only 254 dollars 93 cents, of which mrs. Hickerson's third was 84 dollars 98 cents on the said first of January 1839. Then, after stating the slaves to be of the value of 1994 dollars 50 cents, one third whereof was 664 dollars 83 cents, and the annual interest on that third 39 dollars 89 cents, he made a statement whereby it appeared, that charging mrs. Hickerson with 1588 dollars 72 cents the amount of the judgment with interest to the 27th of May 1833, when King was 637 *King with 500 dollars, less 15 dollars 50 cents the sheriff's commissions on 325 dollars, and also crediting her with the said annual interest of 39 dollars 89 cents from the first of January 1816 to the 17th of February 1838, when she died, and likewise crediting the said 84 dollars 98 cents, a balance still remained due upon the judgment of 261 dollars 88 cents with interest from the 1st of January 1839. The plaintiff excepted to this report, and at his instance the commissioner made a special statement, upon the principle of allowing, in lieu of interest on one third of the value of the slaves, an annual hire of 50 dollars. The first sum of 50 dollars was credited on the first of January 1817, and thereafter annually, whereby, the principal of the judgment on which interest was calculated was annually diminished; and on the first of January 1837, there was, according to this statement, a balance due mrs. Hickerson of 16 dollars and 90 cents. The statement was continued to the first of January 1839, and shewed on that day a balance due her of 163 dollars 15 cents, with interest on 158 dollars 13 cents part thereof from that day till paid. In the statement so continued, mrs. Hickerson was credited with 2 dollars and 2 cents for interest on the 16 dollars and 90 cents on the 1st of January 1839, and 3 dollars for interest on the hires of 1837 to the same time, making 5 dollars and 2 cents as the amount of interest on conjectural hires during the last two years. As bearing upon this statement, it is proper to mention that according to the report of the commissioner in Shumate v. Hickerson, the executor had not, at the time of the sale of the two slaves under execution, other assets with which he could have satisfied that execution.

On the 19th of October 1839 the case of Helm v. Hickerson came on to be heard upon the commissioner's report in that case, and the record in the case of Shumate v. Hickerson. Whereupon the 638 court, approving of *that statement in the report wherein hires were allowed, confirmed the same, and decreed that the injunction be made perpetual, and that the defendant pay to the plaintiff 163 dollars 15 cents, with interest on 158 dollars 13 cents part thereof from the 1st of January 1839 till paid, and the costs.

From this decree, on the petition of the defendant Hosea Hickerson, an appeal was allowed.

The cause was argued by Howard and Robinson for the appellant, and by Seddon and Morson for the appellee. The question most elaborately discussed was whether the deed from Mrs. Hickerson to Lina Helm was made with intent to defraud creditors: but upon this, and indeed upon some other points, a report of the argument is deemed unnecessary. The following notice is confined to the principles of law more particularly involved in the decision.

Howard for appellant. The enquiry which devolved upon the court below was whether the slaves Lucinda and John could properly be sold under the execution. And when the court ascertained that the deed was upon a consideration merely voluntary, it followed that the deed was void as to creditors, and that the slaves might legally be sold.

Under the decision in Pulliam v. Winston &c., 5 Leigh 324, even Mrs. Hickerson herself would not be allowed to tie up the judgment against her, until complicated accounts of administration should be settled, in order to discover whether there would be a distributable surplus. But here the debtor against whom the judgment is rendered asks no injunction to it, and in no way alleges that the debt is not due. The objection to enforcing the judgment is raised by one who, after the rendition of the judgment, received a conveyance 639 from the judgment debtor of a party of her property. Surely *this enquiry cannot be gone into in a suit standing merely between the judgment creditor and the voluntary grantee. The claim of the judgment debtor as distributee can never be used as a setoff against the judgment, in a suit to which the judgment debtor is no party. Nor can the extent of such setoff be ascertained, except by a settlement of the administration account in a suit to which all the distributees are parties.

If, however, it were competent in this suit to set off Mrs. Hickerson's claim as distributee against the judgment, the mode in which this has been done is altogether erroneous. The obvious course was to consider the judgment creditor as entitled to the amount of his judgment, deducting the 325 dollars for which the slave King was sold under the execution, less 15 dollars and 50 cents for commissions. If damage resulted from the seizure and sale of King, the remedy for that damage is by an action on the indemnifying bond; for, the sale having taken place, it is not the province of equity to assess damages. Robertson v. Hogsheads, 3 Leigh 667; Mayo v. Winfree, 2 Leigh 370. But no claim to such damages is asserted by the bill; and there is, in truth, no right to recover damages either at law or in equity. Regarding the plaintiff as a claimant under a voluntary deed, he can have no greater right in this respect than his grantor; and she clearly can claim credit only for the net proceeds of the slave.

The special statement is wholly unsustained by evidence, and the hires entirely conjectural. If it had been right to allow the conjectural sum of 50 dollars a year, it would have been wrong to allow interest upon such conjectural hires. Shields adm'r &c. v. Anderson &c., 3 Leigh 729; Roper &c. v. Wren &c., 6 Leigh 38. Here the slaves had been disposed of, and no hires could have been received. [Stanard, J. It has been settled as a general rule, that the widow is to have the use for life of one third 640 of the money for which the slaves sold. Godwin's adm'r v. Godwin's adm'r &c.*, 4 Leigh 410.] The special statement is wrong not only as to the interest but as to the principal. And in using it as sufficient ground for perpetuating the injunction, the court manifestly erred.

Then there is a decree in favour of the plaintiff for the balance appearing by that special statement. In a suit between Lina Helm plaintiff and Hosea Hickerson defendant, that balance is stated specially as due to Mrs. Hickerson, and the money thus specially stated to be due to her is decreed to be paid to Lina Helm.

Seddon and Morson for appellee. The matter in regard to King is set forth in the bill, and comes within the scope of the general prayer. The defendant has answered the allegations as to this matter. Smith &c. v. Smith &c., 4 Rand. 95; 2 Rob. Pract. 293. And testimony has been taken in regard to it. Under such circumstances the act of February 27, 1828 forbids a reversal of the decree for any informality in the bill. Sess. Acts of 1827-8, p. 20, ch. 25, § 1; Suppl. to Rev. Code p. 125. In the court below, no objection was made that the matter was not put in issue: and the appellant is deprived of the right to make the objection, by failing to urge it at the proper time. 2 Rob. Pract. 434. No party is allowed to surprise or mislead his adversary. Had the objection been earlier made, the appellee might have brought an action at law. But if an action were now brought, the statute of limitations might be pleaded; and the defendant would thus take advantage of his own wrong.

Then as to the jurisdiction. This is a suit, not for damages, but for King or his value. It is on the ground that the sale had been made in an oppressive manner, and ought to be set aside. But even if viewed as a suit for damages, yet as the plaintiff has been obliged to come into equity to injoin the sale of two other 641 slaves *claimed under the same deed, the court, on the principle of preventing multiplicity of suits, will take jurisdiction of the whole case, and decide it as to King as well as the two other slaves. Where the same right which entitles a party to an injunction against future waste entitles him to compensation for past waste, the court of equity will give relief as to both. The court, having jurisdiction of the suit for one purpose, goes on and ends the controversy between the parties. This principle is acted on in many cases. 1 Story's Equity, § 64 a., p. 82-86. The existence of a legal remedy does not, under all circumstances, prevent redress in equity. Randolph v. Randolph &c., 3 Munf. 99; Wilson & Trent v. Butler &c., 3 Munf. 559. Here it was necessary to take notice of the value of the slave, in determining the amount of the credit on account of his being sold.

The case of Pulliam v. Winston &c. is very different from this case, in which there had been a failure for 11 years to settle the executorial accounts on Joseph Hickerson's estate before suit was brought by the legatees, and then every thing was done to delay a settlement, that the process of the court would allow. But even in Pulliam v. Winston &c. it is admitted that the offset will be allowed if the executor agreed to allow it. And here the fact of such agreement is deposed to by a witness whose evidence is sustained by all the circumstances. In that case, too, the objection was taken in the court below, and the injunction dissolved on motion; while here, the case having been proceeded in to a decree, and the account taken, the objection is stripped of its force. Scott & wife v. Halliday &c., 5 Munf. 103; Sampson v. Mitchell's ex'or, 5 Munf. 175. On these grounds, mrs. Hickerson herself might insist on the setoff. But even if she could not, still Helm may insist on its being allowed. It is always compe-

642 tent for the volunteer to require the creditor to shew *that he has a debt.

He may have an account to ascertain its amount,—to ascertain how much is liable to be setoff by a fund in the creditor's hands, and amongst other things the amount to be credited on the judgment.

The rule settled in Godwin's adm'r v. Godwin's adm'r &c. may be a general one, but it is not inflexible. It would not be applied in a case of fraud. Here the executor has been guilty of such negligence that every presumption ought to be made against him. His conduct makes it necessary to resort to conjecture of price or conjecture of hire. And his representative can have no right to insist on the former instead of the latter. The interest allowed on conjectural hires amounts only to a few dollars, and there is a blunder of 15 dollars and 50 cents the other way in regard to commissions.

It is objected, however, that mrs. Hickerson is not a party to this suit. Though the debt could not be ascertained so as to bind her, it could be ascertained so as to bind the parties to this suit. There are various cases in which parties may sue singly; for example, creditors may sue singly to get a fund out of an executor's hands. The case of Moore's adm'r v. George's adm'r, 10 Leigh 228, shews that this court will not extend the objection for want of parties. Besides, the objection was not taken in the court below, and the authorities shew that such objection may be waived. Opinion of Tucker, P., in S. C. Mayo v. Murchie, 3 Munf. 358. The question is not one of jurisdiction, but a matter growing out of a rule of convenience. Calvert on Parties, p. 19, 20, note. The personal representative of a decedent, not party to the suit, is sometimes brought before the master on taking accounts. Story's Eq. Pl. p. 96, § 96, note 1. Mrs. Hickerson was a party in the case of Shumate v. Hickerson, and the accounts have been taken in a case to which all the distributees are parties. Why

643 make her *a party in this? The record of that case also shews that she died while the case was pending, and that it was revived against Lina Helm as her administrator. The decree then in this case is substantially right, and the informality, if any, arising out of the fact that mrs. Hickerson's administrator was not a party to the suit as such, is cured by the act of February 27, 1828, Sess. Acts of 1827-8, p. 20, ch. 25, § 1; Suppl. to Rev. Code p. 125.

Robinson in reply. The bill, fairly understood, makes no case in respect to King. And if it had sought relief in respect to him, there is no ground on which the jurisdiction could be sustained. Is it to be maintained that merely because an injunction was awarded on the former bill, the sale was not to be made at the time appointed by law, but was to be postponed in order that the injunction bond might be given? If a court of equity could interfere on any such ground, the interference would properly be under that bill on which the injunction was awarded: and that case is not before this court. But the sale could not be treated as improperly made, either on that bill or on this. Clarke v. Hoome's ex'ors &c., 2 Hen. & Munf. 23; Stratford v. Twynam, Jacob 418; 4 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 193. If the plaintiff sought, by force of his deed to recover the value of the slave, his remedy was by an action on the indemnifying bond: if he sought to recover the specific property, his proper course was to bring an action of detinue against the purchaser. A legal title being claimed on the one hand under execution against the debtor, and a paramount title on the other under the debtor's deed, a court of law was obviously the proper tribunal to determine which of these titles was the best.

Is it clear that it was proper for a court of equity to exercise jurisdiction as to Lucinda and John? As to them, the court 644 *except upon the ground that slaves are considered prima facie of peculiar value to their owners. Allen v. Freeland, 3 Rand. 170; Randolph v. Randolph, 6 Rand. 194. Does that presumption exist here, or is it repelled? In Allen v. Freeland, judge Carr takes the distinction between family slaves and those recently purchased by the plaintiff; and judge Green said, the appellant there did not appear to have seen the slaves before he purchased them. In Randolph v. Randolph, the judges cite, on the one hand, cases of peculiar attachment, and, on the other, cases of large slaveholders, where the slave is not even personally known, or cases in which the slave is a subject of traffic. What are the circumstances here? The complainant never had the slaves till the spring of 1832. He obtained them then, not by a purchase of specific slaves on account of any peculiar qualities, but by a transfer from Mrs. Hickerson of her interest in a particular estate, in the division of which these slaves were afterwards allotted as her portion. To him it was the same whether he obtained these or other slaves, or other property of equal value. There was no peculiar affection between the master and these particular slaves, such as made him desire to retain them in specie. This is evidence from the fact deposed to by Meredith and Rodham Eskridge, that immediately upon his being restored to possession by the injunction, he endeavoured to sell them, and as soon as practicable did sell them.

On the other side it is contended, that though the deed shall be held to be voluntary, the judgment is to be reduced by whatever amount may be due Mrs. Hickerson as a distributee of her husband's estate. This ground is taken in a suit to which she is no party, and in which, no matter what the view of the court may be upon the accounts, it can make no decree perpetuating the injunction to the judgment, either in whole or in part. But suppose her

645 grantee may require all *that she could have required, if she had made no assignment, and were the plaintiff in the bill; Pulliam v. Winston &c., 5 Leigh 324, settles that she cannot be received in equity to make any setoff of this nature. It is however insisted that this case is an exception to the general rule, because here the executor agreed that any claim which Mrs. Hickerson had against the estate might be discounted. To establish such agreement, an expression of the executor is deposed to by a witness 20 years after the transaction. The act of the executor in taking the bond and security is far stronger than such words as are here deposed to. If he was satisfied that her portion of the estate would be equal to the amount of the bond, and agreed that the one should be set off against the other, why take bond and security at all? His taking it is at least evidence that it was not certain her portion would be sufficient. It would be contrary to well established principles to allow the force of the bond to be destroyed by parol evidence of this uncertain character. Where an agreement to set off is relied on, it should be an agreement at a subsequent time, after there has been opportunity to clear up the doubt existing at the time of taking the bond. The decree directing an enquiry to ascertain Mrs. Hickerson's share as distributee was then improper.

But if it was proper to go into any such account, the principle upon which it was directed to be stated in regard to King is clearly erroneous. The report made under the court's direction establishes the impropriety of its direction. At the time of the sale of King, the amount of the judgment was 1588 dollars 72 cents, and if from this there be deducted 678 dollars 13 cents for the annual interest from the first of January 1816 to the first of January 1833 on one third of the value of the slaves sold, there was yet due on the judgment, when King 646 *credit be also given for a third of the amount of sales to Mrs. Hickerson herself (though remaining unpaid), as well as of all other personal estate, there was still due upon the judgment at that time more than 300 dollars. Under these circumstances, what conceivable reason can there be for giving credit on account of the sale of King, for more than he produced at the sheriff's sale?

Then as to the question whether interest on a third of the value of the slaves sold shall be allowed, or conjectural hires. Neither in the bill of the legatees nor in this bill is there any allegation that the slaves of Joseph Hickerson were sold improperly. Nor is there any thing whatever to take this case out of the general principle established in Godwin's adm'r v. Godwin's adm'x &c., 4 Leigh 410. Charging Marshall Hickerson with the amount of Mrs. Hickerson's bond, and leaving out the sales of slaves, his account was about even. He had then either to remain in advance to the estate the amount of the debt due by Mrs. Hickerson, or to get from her that debt, or to sell slaves. He was under no obligation to remain in advance: she did not pay the debt: and he sold slaves. When it has been settled as a general rule, that though a widow's share of slaves be unnecessarily sold to pay debts, she is to be compensated by interest on one third of the slaves, what is there in this case to authorize a departure from that rule? So far from being a stronger case in favour of the widow than the case generally is, it is a weaker one. For it was necessary to sell the slaves unless she paid her debt. And it is not for her whose default has been the cause of this, to say that the burthen of the executor shall be increased, because he has done that which her default made necessary.

But the error did not stop here. Having settled the principle, it was at least proper, when there was no sort of evidence to shew what hire would be fair, to 647 *refer it to a commissioner to report on this subject. All enquiry of this sort was passed by, and the special statement acted upon, although that statement was not the view of the commissioner upon the evidence, but the mere ex parte suggestion of counsel.

That ex parte statement is not only without evidence to shew that 50 dollars a year was a fair hire, but is wrong upon its face in allowing interest on such conjectural hires. It may appear as if the interest so allowed were only 5 dollars 2 cents, but it is in fact much more. If the interest on the judgment had been calculated to 1839, and then a deduction made, as of that date, of the conjectural hires from 1816 to 1839, there would be no interest on such hires. But the conjectural hires are credited at the end of each year from 1816 to 1839, and the effect is to allow interest to the extent to which the creditor loses interest by having his principal diminished before 1839.

BALDWIN, J. The merits of this cause turn upon the question whether the interest of mrs. Hickerson in the personal estate of her husband Joseph Hickerson deceased (with the credit to which she is entitled for her property sold under execution) is sufficient, and properly applicable, to extinguish the debt contracted by her for purchases at the sale made by Marshall Hickerson his executor. This involves an enquiry into the principles upon which the accounts have been settled by the master commissioner, under the order of the circuit court. The basis of the settlement is a report made by the same master commissioner, in another suit of Shumate &c. v. Hickerson &c. then depending in the same court, of several accounts directed by interlocutory decrees in that suit; to wit, an account of the administration of Marshall Hickerson upon the estate of Joseph Hickerson deceased; another, of the administration de bonis non of Hosea Hickerson upon the estate 648 of *Joseph Hickerson deceased; and a third, of the administration of Hosea Hickerson upon the estate of Marshall Hickerson deceased. The result of that report is a balance against Marshall Hickerson as executor of Joseph Hickerson; a balance in favour of Hosea Hickerson as administrator de bonis non of Joseph Hickerson; and a balance against him as administrator of Marshall Hickerson. It was upon the basis of the accounts thus reported, that the master commissioner proceeded in the present cause to ascertain the aforesaid interest of mrs. Hickerson, who was a party in the case of Shumate &c. v. Hickerson &c. but not in the present suit. Mrs. Hickerson being entitled absolutely to a distributive share of one third in the residue of her husband's personal estate exclusive of the slaves, after payment of his debts, and to one third of the slaves as her dower for life only, the commissioner restated the accounts, so as to show in the first place a balance against Marshall Hickerson executor of Joseph Hickerson, exclusive of the slaves, of 254 dollars 93 cents, after deducting the balance due to Hosea Hickerson as administrator de bonis non of Joseph Hickerson; the one third of which balance, to wit, 84 dollars 98 cents, he reported in favour of mrs. Hickerson. He then went on to ascertain what she was further entitled to, on account of her interest in the slaves. None of these were forthcoming. It appears from the appraisement that there were seven. Two of them were sold under execution: two were specifically bequeathed by the testator, and the presumption is were delivered over to the legatees: two others were sold by the executor Marshall Hickerson, but when, or for what prices, does not appear: the record furnishes no information of the disposition made of the seventh, and the probability is that he was old and of little or no value. The widow, for whom no provision was made by the will, claimed that made for her by law. Her dower in the slaves being one third for life, and she

649 *having been deprived thereof by the conduct of the executor, compensation could be made to her therefor in but one of two modes; to wit, by allowing her the annual interest during her life on one third of the value of the slaves, or by allowing one third of the annual estimated hires. The commissioner made statements in both ways, debiting the widow with the judgment against her for purchases at the sale, and crediting her, in the first, with one third annually of the interest on the value of the slaves, and in the second, with one third annually of the estimated hires; and in both, with her distributive share of the other personal estate, and with the actual value of the slave King (acquired from her father's estate and sold under the first execution upon said judgment) minus the sheriff's commission upon the sale. The result of the first statement was a balance against the widow, of 261 dollars 88 cents with interest from the 1st of January 1839; and of the second a balance in her favour, of 163 dollars 15 cents with interest on 158 dollars 13 cents thereof from the same date. This last statement was adopted by the circuit court, and the decree rendered against the defendant Hosea Hickerson individually; doubtless because there were ample assets in his hands as administrator of Marshall Hickerson's estate, for payment of the amount thus ascertained to be due to the widow and chargeable against that estate, after the extinguishment of the judgment by the application of her credits.

If this adjustment of the accounts between Elizabeth Hickerson and the estate of her deceased husband be correct, it relieves us from the necessity of considering the questions so elaborately discussed at the bar, arising out of the allegation of the defendant that the conveyance to the plaintiff Helm, by Elizabeth Hickerson, of her interest in her father's estate, was voluntary and fraudulent as regards her 650 creditors; inasmuch as it *will thus appear that the defendant has no right in a court of equity to occupy that relation towards her. And this brings us to the consideration of the objections to that adjustment urged on the part of the appellant.

In the first place, it is contended that the whole adjustment is wrong, on the ground that a court of equity ought not to interpose by way of injunction, to ascertain and set off a distributive interest in an estate, against a debt contracted by the distributee for purchases from the executor of property belonging to the estate. This is certainly correct as a general proposition, and is well established by the authorities cited for the appellant. Such a practice would occasion much confusion and injustice, by obstructing and perplexing the executor in the administration of the assets, exposing him to the danger of devastavit, and subjecting creditors of the estate to injurious delays. The rule however is not free from exception, and the reasons upon which it is founded are inapplicable to the case before us. All the difficulties which have occurred in the administration and distribution of this estate are attributable to the misconduct of Marshall Hickerson the executor, and the defendant Hosea Hickerson, his administrator and successor. There has been the most unreasonable delay in the settlement of the administration accounts. No step towards it was taken during the six years which elapsed from the time of the executor's qualification in 1815 until his death in 1821. In August 1821, the defendant Hosea Hickerson qualified as administrator of Marshall Hickerson, and as administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of Joseph Hickerson; but instead of settling up the administration accounts of himself and his predecessor in a reasonable time, he failed to do so for a period of nearly twelve years prior to the institution of this suit in July 1833. Nor could he

651 be brought to such settlement, *in the suit instituted against him for that purpose in 1827, by Shumate and other distributees of Joseph Hickerson, until coerced by attachments for his contempt in disobeying orders of the court in that suit. Thus a period of eighteen years prior to the institution of this suit was suffered by the personal representatives of the estate in question to elapse without a settlement of their administration accounts. This delay, connected with the representation made by Marshall Hickerson at the time of the executorial sale, that there was no danger in becoming the widow's surety for the amount of the purchases made by her, inasmuch as it would fall far short of her distributive interest in the estate, was well calculated to lull her into security, and inspire the belief that payment of her bond would not be exacted, unless shewn to be necessary by a settlement of the administration accounts. And if the judgment recovered against her in 1827 had a tendency to remove this impression, it could not have suggested the necessity of a suit on her part for the recovery of her distributive share; inasmuch as the suit of Shumate &c. v. Hickerson &c. brought by the other distributees in 1827, to which she was a party, would have accomplished that object, but for the continued default of the defendant Hosea Hickerson; whose conduct was extremely unjust and oppressive in suing out execution against her, in 1833, upon the judgment, while in contempt of the orders of court requiring a settlement of the administration accounts. I think, under the circumstances, it was entirely proper that he should be restrained by injunction from proceeding upon the execution, until he should shew, by a full and fair settlement of the estate, that the purposes of justice required it: that if he could have been subjected at that late period to any inconvenience or hazard, it was far from arising out of the due discharge of his duties: and that any creditors who 652 *had so long postponed the prosecution of their demands against the estate would more probably be benefited than injured by the aid of the court in sifting the accounts of the delinquent fiduciaries.

In the next place, it is urged that the compensation to the widow for her dower right in the slaves ought to have been the interest on the value, instead of estimated hires. I am at a loss to perceive any principle upon which that pretension can be sustained. The widow was entitled to her dower interest in kind; an important privilege, of which she could not be lawfully deprived, unless by a sale of the slaves rendered necessary for payment of the debts by the inadequacy of the other personal assets. In regard to the slaves specifically bequeathed, and supposed to have been surrendered to the legatees, there is not a shadow of apology for disregarding the dower interest of the widow. As to those sold by the executor, it has not been shewn when, or for what amount, or under what circumstances they were sold; and on the other hand it is apparent from the master commissioner's report, that there was no deficiency of the other personal assets, a balance having been reported against him on that account. The only colour for a sale of slaves is as respects those sold under execution in April 1816, when it may be supposed that the fund arising from the executorial sale of the perishable property belonging to the estate was not available, the bonds therefor not falling due until November following. It certainly would be unreasonable to charge an executor with the injurious consequences arising from a forced sale of slaves under execution, before it was in his power to obtain from the assets the means of payment: but that is not the question here. The slaves were purchased in by the ex-it is not for her whose default has been the cause of this, to say that the burthen of the executor shall be increased, because he has done that which her default made necessary.

But the error did not stop here. Having settled the principle, it was at least proper, when there was no sort of evidence to shew what hire would be fair, to 647 *refer it to a commissioner to report on this subject. All enquiry of this sort was passed by, and the special statement acted upon, although that statement was not the view of the commissioner upon the evidence, but the mere ex parte suggestion of counsel.

That ex parte statement is not only without evidence to shew that 50 dollars a year was a fair hire, but is wrong upon its face in allowing interest on such conjectural hires. It may appear as if the interest so allowed were only 5 dollars 2 cents, but it is in fact much more. If the interest on the judgment had been calculated to 1839, and then a deduction made, as of that date, of the conjectural hires from 1816 to 1839, there would be no interest on such hires. But the conjectural hires are credited at the end of each year from 1816 to 1839, and the effect is to allow interest to the extent to which the creditor loses interest by having his principal diminished before 1839.

BALDWIN, J. The merits of this cause turn upon the question whether the interest of mrs. Hickerson in the personal estate of her husband Joseph Hickerson deceased (with the credit to which she is entitled for her property sold under execution) is sufficient, and properly applicable, to extinguish the debt contracted by her for purchases at the sale made by Marshall Hickerson his executor. This involves an enquiry into the principles upon which the accounts have been settled by the master commissioner, under the order of the circuit court. The basis of the settlement is a report made by the same master commissioner, in another suit of Shumate &c. v. Hickerson &c. then depending in the same court, of several accounts directed by interlocutory decrees in that suit; to wit, an account of the administration of Marshall Hickerson upon the estate of Joseph Hickerson deceased; another, of the administration de bonis non of Hosea Hickerson upon the estate 648 of *Joseph Hickerson deceased; and a third, of the administration of Hosea Hickerson upon the estate of Marshall Hickerson deceased. The result of that report is a balance against Marshall Hickerson as executor of Joseph Hickerson; a balance in favour of Hosea Hickerson as administrator de bonis non of Joseph Hickerson; and a balance against him as administrator of Marshall Hickerson. It was upon the basis of the accounts thus reported, that the master commissioner proceeded in the present cause to ascertain the aforesaid interest of mrs. Hickerson, who was a party in the case of Shumate &c. v. Hickerson &c. but not in the present suit. Mrs. Hickerson being entitled absolutely to a distributive share of one third in the residue of her husband's personal estate exclusive of the slaves, after payment of his debts, and to one third of the slaves as her dower for life only, the commissioner restated the accounts, so as to show in the first place a balance against Marshall Hickerson executor of Joseph Hickerson, exclusive of the slaves, of 254 dollars 93 cents, after deducting the balance due to Hosea Hickerson as administrator de bonis non of Joseph Hickerson; the one third of which balance, to wit, 84 dollars 98 cents, he reported in favour of mrs. Hickerson. He then went on to ascertain what she was further entitled to, on account of her interest in the slaves. None of these were forthcoming. It appears from the appraisement that there were seven. Two of them were sold under execution: two were specifically bequeathed by the testator, and the presumption is were delivered over to the legatees: two others were sold by the executor Marshall Hickerson, but when, or for what prices, does not appear: the record furnishes no information of the disposition made of the seventh, and the probability is that he was old and of little or no value. The widow, for whom no provision was made by the will, claimed that made for her by law. Her dower in the slaves being one third for life, and she 649 *having been deprived thereof by the conduct of the executor, compensation could be made to her therefor in but one of two modes; to wit, by allowing her the annual interest during her life on one third of the value of the slaves, or by allowing one third of the annual estimated hires. The commissioner made statements in both ways, debiting the widow with the judgment against her for purchases at the sale, and crediting her, in the first, with one third annually of the interest on the value of the slaves, and in the second, with one third annually of the estimated hires; and in both, with her distributive share of the other personal estate, and with the actual value of the slave King (acquired from her father's estate and sold under the first execution upon said judgment) minus the sheriff's commission upon the sale. The result of the first statement was a balance against the widow, of 261 dollars 88 cents with interest from the 1st of January 1839; and of the second a balance in her favour, of 163 dollars 15 cents with interest on 158 dollars 13 cents thereof from the same date. This last statement was adopted by the circuit court, and the decree rendered against the defendant Hosea Hickerson individually; doubtless because there were ample assets in his hands as administrator of Marshall Hickerson's estate, for payment of the amount thus ascertained to be due to the widow and chargeable against that estate, after the extinguishment of the judgment by the application of her credits.

If this adjustment of the accounts between Elizabeth Hickerson and the estate of her deceased husband be correct, it relieves us from the necessity of considering the questions so elaborately discussed at the bar, arising out of the allegation of the defendant that the conveyance to the plaintiff Helm, by Elizabeth Hickerson, of her interest in her father's estate, was voluntary and fraudulent as regards her 650 creditors; inasmuch as it *will thus appear that the defendant has no right in a court of equity to occupy that relation towards her. And this brings us to the consideration of the objections to that adjustment urged on the part of the appellant.

In the first place, it is contended that the whole adjustment is wrong, on the ground that a court of equity ought not to interpose by way of injunction, to ascertain and set off a distributive interest in an estate, against a debt contracted by the distributee for purchases from the executor of property belonging to the estate. This is certainly correct as a general proposition, and is well established by the authorities cited for the appellant. Such a practice would occasion much confusion and injustice, by obstructing and perplexing the executor in the administration of the assets, exposing him to the danger of devastavit, and subjecting creditors of the estate to injurious delays. The rule however is not free from exception, and the reasons upon which it is founded are inapplicable to the case before us. All the difficulties which have occurred in the administration and distribution of this estate are attributable to the misconduct of Marshall Hickerson the executor, and the defendant Hosea Hickerson, his administrator and successor. There has been the most unreasonable delay in the settlement of the administration accounts. No step towards it was taken during the six years which elapsed from the time of the executor's qualification in 1815 until his death in 1821. In August 1821, the defendant Hosea Hickerson qualified as administrator of Marshall Hickerson, and as administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of Joseph Hickerson; but instead of settling up the administration accounts of himself and his predecessor in a reasonable time, he failed to do so for a period of nearly twelve years prior to the institution of this suit in July 1833. Nor could he

651 be brought to such settlement, *in the suit instituted against him for that purpose in 1827, by Shumate and other distributees of Joseph Hickerson, until coerced by attachments for his contempt in disobeying orders of the court in that suit. Thus a period of eighteen years prior to the institution of this suit was suffered by the personal representatives of the estate in question to elapse without a settlement of their administration accounts. This delay, connected with the representation made by Marshall Hickerson at the time of the executorial sale, that there was no danger in becoming the widow's surety for the amount of the purchases made by her, inasmuch as it would fall far short of her distributive interest in the estate, was well calculated to lull her into security, and inspire the belief that payment of her bond would not be exacted, unless shewn to be necessary by a settlement of the administration accounts. And if the judgment recovered against her in 1827 had a tendency to remove this impression, it could not have suggested the necessity of a suit on her part for the recovery of her distributive share; inasmuch as the suit of Shumate &c. v. Hickerson &c. brought by the other distributees in 1827, to which she was a party, would have accomplished that object, but for the continued default of the defendant Hosea Hickerson; whose conduct was extremely unjust and oppressive in suing out execution against her, in 1833, upon the judgment, while in contempt of the orders of court requiring a settlement of the administration accounts. I think, under the circumstances, it was entirely proper that he should be restrained by injunction from proceeding upon the execution, until he should shew, by a full and fair settlement of the estate, that the purposes of justice required it: that if he could have been subjected at that late period to any inconvenience or hazard, it was far from arising out of the due discharge of his 652 *duties: and that any creditors who had so long postponed the prosecution of their demands against the estate would more probably be benefited than injured by the aid of the court in sifting the accounts of the delinquent fiduciaries.

In the next place, it is urged that the compensation to the widow for her dower right in the slaves ought to have been the interest on the value, instead of estimated hires. I am at a loss to perceive any principle upon which that pretension can be sustained. The widow was entitled to her dower interest in kind; an important privilege, of which she could not be lawfully deprived, unless by a sale of the slaves rendered necessary for payment of the debts by the inadequacy of the other personal assets. In regard to the slaves specifically bequeathed, and supposed to have been surrendered to the legatees, there is not a shadow of apology for disregarding the dower interest of the widow. As to those sold by the executor, it has not been shewn when, or for what amount, or under what circumstances they were sold; and on the other hand it is apparent from the master commissioner's report, that there was no deficiency of the other personal assets, a balance having been reported against him on that account. The only colour for a sale of slaves is as respects those sold under execution in April 1816, when it may be supposed that the fund arising from the executorial sale of the perishable property belonging to the estate was not available, the bonds therefore not falling due until November following. It certainly would be unreasonable to charge an executor with the injurious consequences arising from a forced sale of slaves under execution, before it was in his power to obtain from the assets the means of payment: but that is not the question here. The slaves were purchased in by the executor himself; and, under the circumstances, he ought to be treated in relation thereto as the trustee of the estate. The sale moneys of the personal estate 653 were to fall due at *no distant period.

It was the duty of the executor to do the best he could for the preservation of the interests confided to his care; and the plea of an inevitable prejudice cannot avail him, when we find that he had the means of becoming the purchaser. It ought to be presumed that he raised the money upon the credit of the estate, or that he advanced it himself upon that security; a presumption working no injustice; for if he gave the full value, he is reimbursed by a credit for the purchase money, and if he did not, it would be of dangerous consequence to permit him so to speculate upon the temporary necessities of the estate.

The credit therefore for hires, instead of interest, is correct in principle, and is not in conflict, as supposed, with the decision of this court in Godwin's adm'r v. Godwin's adm'x &c., 4 Leigh 410. The question there was as to the prospective allowance to be made to a widow out of the proceeds of slaves, sold by the executor under an innocent misapprehension that the situation of the estate required the sale for the payment of debts; and it was held that she should receive one third of the purchase money, to be enjoyed by her during her life, and then returned to the estate; an allowance considered by the court more equitable than a commutation for a gross sum, the proper amount of which it would be difficult to ascertain by calculations, involving, as they must, an estimate of complicated hazards. But in the case before us, the question is in regard to the retributive compensation to be made for a dower right, from the enjoyment of which the widow was debarred during her life by the gross injustice of the executor. That the allowance is of estimated hires, from imperfect materials, is the fault of the executor himself, who has furnished no account or evidence in relation to the slaves, whether of hires or sales; in consequence of which the commissioner has

654 chiefly upon the appraised value of the slaves, most probably to the detriment of the widow; and upon that basis, if he has committed an error, it is obviously not to the prejudice of the executor. His allowance of interest on estimated hires was for but a brief period and on a small balance, and not excepted to by the defendant. Such minute errors in a commissioner's report, however obvious, especially when unexcepted to, are not proper for the consideration of an appellate court; as

*Note by the reporter. It is believed to be unnecessary to except to what is not reported by the commissioner as his view of the case. A party may contend for a particular mode of stating the account, and having a special statement in that mode, but it is unnecessary to except to his statement, and indeed as irregular as it would except to his argument.

they would require, from its repugnance to the reversal of the decree for a small matter, a reexamination, and it may be a re-statement of the whole account, in order to ascertain whether there may not be errors to an equal or greater amount on the other side.

Again, the appellant insists that the proper credit to the widow on account of the slave King, sold under the first execution against her, is the net proceeds of the sale, and nothing more; that if his actual value at the time was 500 dollars, (which is denied, though I think proved) still the credit for that sum, minus the sheriff's commission on the price obtained, is wrong in principle; and that to allow it, is in effect to assess damages in a court of equity for proceeding at law under process of execution. This objection would, I think, be well founded if the result of the credit were an actual loss to the defendant, as would be the case if the property had been purchased by a stranger. But the defendant, having become the purchaser himself, is in fact subjected to no loss. He is merely denied an unrighteous gain, arising out of a sacrifice of the property occasioned by his own iniquitous and oppressive conduct. The question necessarily arose, 655 upon the *facts stated in the bill, in the adjustment of the matters of account involved in the controversy; and was not at all cognizable at law. The defendant had an undoubted legal right to enforce his judgment by process of execution; but his exercise of it under the circumstances, not only to the prejudice of his adversary but to his own individual profit, could not be countenanced in a court of equity. The mode of relief was the only one that could be adopted, unless the defendant had been required to surrender the property, which it does not appear that he offered, nor that it was still in his power to do. The question was merely as to the measure of relief, that is to say, the proper amount of the credit; and that fell within the province and discretion of the court, in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction over the whole subject, of which it was an inseparable incident.

There is much plausibility in the argument founded upon the master commissioner's report, that at the time the defendant's execution was levied upon King, the widow was still in arrear on account of her purchases at the executorial sale, to a greater amount than the value of the property levied on. I think it not improbable that such would be the result of a statement based upon the materials furnished by the report, though none has been made by the commissioner with a view to that enquiry. But its concession does not relieve the defendant from the impropriety and injustice of proceeding to enforce the whole amount of his judgment, without giving the widow the smallest credit on account of her interest in the estate, every particle of which had been withheld from her for a period of eighteen years, unless upon the supposition of an agreement that the payment of her bond was to await a settlement of the estate. After the assurance given by his predecessor at the time of the widow's purchases, and the great 656 laches of both in regard to their administration *accounts, it was not for him to decide, without a settlement, and in contempt of the orders of court requiring a settlement, upon the question of the widow's indebtedness. Nor can the materials furnished by the report be relied upon as shewing the balance due, on one side or the other, at any given period of time prior to the final adjustment; for they do not consist of accounts actually kept, but of substitutes therefor, resorted to for the purpose of preventing a failure of justice.

Thus it seems to me, that the decree of the circuit court was founded upon a correct adjustment of the matters of account involved in the controversy, and that Mrs. Hickerson, under the circumstances, was entitled to the interposition of the court to restrain the defendant from further proceeding upon his judgment at law. I can perceive no good reason why the actual plaintiff, as her grantee or donee, should be excluded from the benefit of her equity, so far as to prevent the slaves embraced in her conveyance to him from being subjected to the defendant's process of execution against her. But I think it clear that she ought to have been made a party in the cause, inasmuch as she was directly interested in the settlement of the accounts, and the plaintiff Helm had no interest therein, except for the purpose of shewing that the defendant's demand was extinguished. She died however in the progress of the suit, and Helm became her administrator, and as such the proper representative of her interests. If she had been a defendant in the cause, he could not have revived it against himself as her administrator. Her death and his administration were judicially known to the court, being disclosed by the record in the case of Shumate v. Hickerson, made part of the record in the present suit, and referred to in the decrees. The omission to state these facts on the order book, or by a supplemental 657 bill, was a mere informality, for which *it would be improper to reverse the decree, especially since the statute of the 27th of February 1828, Suppl. to Rev. Code, p. 125, which declares that no "decree of a court of equity shall be reversed for informality in the proceedings, where the parties have proceeded to take their depositions, and it appears to the court that there has been a full and fair hearing upon the merits, and that substantial justice has been done between the parties." And this gives the proper answer to the appellant's objection that the balance found due to the widow is decreed to be paid to the plaintiff Helm. It will not be improper, however, for preventing any possible future misconstruction, to amend the decree in this particular, by directing the payment to be made to Helm in his character of administrator. A further amendment of the decree will also be proper, to supply its omission to require a refunding bond in regard to any future demands against the estate.

STANARD, J. The appellee sought the aid of a court of equity by injunction to the sale of slaves on which an execution had been levied as the property of Elizabeth Hickerson, on the ground that the slaves were his property in virtue of a conveyance from the said Elizabeth. He claims that under that conveyance he became the owner of the slaves, either as a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration, or as a donee. If he sustained his title as bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration, the only question that would arise is that respecting the jurisdiction of the court of equity to interpose its protection by way of injunction to the sale. The question of jurisdiction must, I think, have been resolved, on the authority of many decisions of this court, in favour of the appellee; and being so resolved, the relief that a court of equity should give would be the perpetuation of the injunction to the sale of the slaves 658 which were under execution at the time the injunction *was awarded.

Such relief would be granted, irrespective of any question concerning the fact or amount of indebtedness from Elizabeth Hickerson to the claimant under the execution, and consequently all enquiry into that matter would be superfluous, and foreign to the question of the relief to which the appellee was entitled. Viewing the case under this aspect, the indebtedness of Elizabeth Hickerson to the claimant under the execution would not restrict, nor would the absence of such indebtedness enlarge the relief proper to be given the appellee. Under this aspect of the case the appellee, would have no colour of right to resort to a court of equity to recover the slave that had been taken and sold under a previous execution. That taking and sale would be an invasion of his right of property for which he would have a plain and adequate remedy at law, and for which he could no more obtain redress in equity, than he could for any other trespass on or dispossession of his personal property, for which the law had provided the remedy of an action of trespass, trover or detinue.

In the relief that has been given by the decree in this case, the court below has not regarded the appellee as a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration, but has (and I think properly) regarded the conveyance to him from Elizabeth Hickerson as voluntary: and with this element in the case many questions arise as to the propriety of granting in equity any relief, and if any, the nature and extent of that relief.

Viewing the conveyance from Elizabeth Hickerson to the appellee as voluntary, the questions are, Ought the enforcement of the judgment at law against Elizabeth Hickerson to be enjoined until the extent of her interests as distributee and dowress in the estate of her deceased husband, for which Marshall Hickerson was responsible, should be liquidated and adjusted, with a view to a setoff of the amount thereof

I concur with my brother Baldwin in the opinion, that under the circumstances of this case, it was proper to make it an exception to the rule (which, as a general one, has my hearty approbation) that denies to a creditor or distributee the aid of a court of equity to intercept by injunction the collection of the assets by the executor or administrator, especially those arising from the sales of the executor or administrator, until the administration accounts are adjusted, with the view that the debt or distributive share may be set off; unless the title to such setoff be founded on the express agreement of the executor or administrator. There is evidence, direct and inferential, tending strongly to prove that such agreement was made in this case. This, coupled with the long continued delinquency of the executor and his representative to settle the administration account of the estate of Joseph Hickerson, and the delays to which the suit brought by the distributees of Joseph Hickerson to have that account settled has been subjected, mainly by the neglect and contumacy of the appellant the representative of the executor, justify the court in making this case an exception to the general rule. If Elizabeth Hickerson had not conveyed to the appellee, but still retained title to the slaves on which the execution was levied, she would be entitled to protection by injunction until the amount of her claim on Marshall Hickerson as the executor of her husband should be ascertained, and when ascertained, to set off the same against the judgment. The appellee, claiming under her conveyance, had as strong a claim to this equitable protection of the slaves conveyed to him by her, as she herself would have had if no such conveyance had been made; at least so 660 far as *that protection operated on the interests of the appellant. But from the very nature of this claim, Elizabeth Hickerson was an indispensable party to a suit in equity asserting it. The necessity of making her a party in such a suit is evinced by the consideration that it involved the adjustment and appropriation of her claim on the representative of her husband, and that unless she were a party thereto, the adjustment and appropriation that might be made of that claim by the decree would not bind her, and the representative of the executor would still be exposed to her suit, unprotected by such adjustment and appropriation. What, in my opinion, is the effect of the omission to make her or her representative a party to this suit, and what the proper mode of supplying that omission, will be stated in the sequel.

While I think the court below was right in maintaining the title of the appellee to its interposition in this case, I cannot approve of its decree. That, in my opinion, is in many respects erroneous.

The account by which the amount of the setoff to the judgment was to be liquidated could not have been properly settled but in a suit in which all the unsatisfied distributees of Joseph Hickerson should be parties. Such a suit had been brought many years before, and was pending at the institution of this. That and other considerations rendered it improper to make those distributees parties in this suit. In this predicament, the proper course was to retain the injunction in this suit until, by the adjustment of the account in the other, the amount of Elizabeth Hickerson's claim on the executor of her husband was finally liquidated; and then to apply this liquidated claim as a setoff against the judgment. It was therefore premature to render in this case a final decree giving to the appellee the benefit of the entire claim of Elizabeth Hickerson on the executor, while the suit in which only it could be properly liquidated

661 *remained undecided. Furthermore, as has been before stated, Elizabeth Hickerson or her representative was a necessary party, and no decree should have been rendered until that omission was supplied.

In my opinion it was wrong, in adjusting the relief to which the appellee was entitled against the appellant, to subject the appellant to a charge for the estimated value of the slave that had been taken and sold under the appellant's execution before the institution of this suit. Had the appellee been a bona fide purchaser for value from Elizabeth Hickerson, he would have had no title to relief in equity in respect to that slave after the levy and sale. I cannot understand how his title to relief, and the measure of such relief, can be extended by reducing his right in the slave to that of a claimant under a voluntary conveyance. Where there are contested mutual claims, and one claimant has his judgment at law, against an execution on which his antagonist might have obtained an injunction, but does not, and such execution issues, is levied, and the property is sold, the plaintiff in the execution has never been held chargeable in equity for the estimated value of the property sold, though it should be ascertained by that court, on the adjustment of the mutual claim, that he was indebted as much as or more than the amount of the execution, to the party against whom it issued. A fortiori such responsibility could not attach, when, on the adjustment of the claim, the judgment claimant is creditor to an amount above the mutual claim, equal to that levied under the execution. In this case it was ascertained, that after allowing credit for the entire claim of Elizabeth Hickerson on the executor of her husband, she was indebted, when the slave King was taken and sold, more than the amount for which he sold. The credit in respect to that slave should have been limited to the amount made on the execution by the sale of him.

662 *My opinion is that an undue allowance was made for the dower interest of Mrs. Hickerson in the slaves of her husband, by charging in her favour the estimated hires of her dower interest in all the slaves of which her husband died possessed. In respect to the two sold under execution before the executor had other assets with which he could satisfy the judgment, it is perfectly clear that if they had been purchased by a stranger, the executor could not have been made responsible for hires. I cannot perceive that the purchase of them by the executor himself would leave him exposed to such responsibility. The sale was made without culpable default in him, and at the sheriff's sale he, though executor, might purchase, as any other might; and a purchase by him, without fraud, as effectually withdrew those slaves from the dower claim on them specifically, as if the purchase had been by another. And yet the decree has subjected him to a charge for hires which he has not received, as though there had been no sale, and such hires had been received by him. In respect to the four other slaves, while I do not question that a case may exist of such gross misconduct of an executor, as to render him justly chargeable to the widow for hires of slaves that he ought to allot as her dower, but which he has wantonly sold, I think that, having regard to all the circumstances of this case, the dower interest in these four slaves should be adjusted (as I am satisfied it ought to be in respect to the other two) upon the principle adopted by this court in the case of Godwin's adm'r v. Godwin's adm'x &c., 4 Leigh 410. Furthermore, in a case in which the estimated hires would properly be chargeable to the executor, the amount of that charge, where it was impossible to trace the slaves and ascertain how long they lived, should be fixed by making a due allowance for the risk of life, and abating the amount thereof from the estimate of hires. The 663 *slaves may have died shortly after the sale, and the widow claiming hires would be entitled to them for so long only as the slaves lived. To make the dower right in a slave equivalent to a certain estate for life of the widow, an insurance of his life during that of the widow must be made; and the amount of such insurance would be the proper measure of abatement from the estimate of hires during the life of the widow.

ALLEN, J., concurring in the opinion of Stanard, J., the decree of the court of appeals was entered in the following terms:

The court is of opinion that the court below prematurely decreed final relief in this case, while the suit of Shumate &c. v. Hickerson, in which alone the accounts necessary to the final decision of this could be regularly adjusted, remained undecided, and while neither Elizabeth Hickerson nor her representative was a party: that, instead of a final decree, the court below ought to have required the representative of Elizabeth Hickerson to be made a party, and continued the injunction in this case until, by the decision in the case of Shumate &c. v. Hickerson, the claim of Elizabeth Hickerson on the executor of her husband had been adjusted: and that in the adjustment of that claim, and the account between Elizabeth Hickerson, or the appellee holding her place, and the estate of Marshall Hickerson the executor of her deceased husband, the charge to the representative of Marshall Hickerson for the slave sold under execution should be limited to the net proceeds of that sale, and the charge for the dower interest of Elizabeth Hickerson in the slaves left by her husband, instead of being measured by the estimated hires of the slaves, should have been an annual sum from the death of her husband until her death, equal to the annual interest of one third of the gross amount of the sales

664 or the value *of the slaves. Therefore it is considered that the said decree be reversed with costs. And it is ordered that the cause be remanded to the circuit superior court, for further proceedings according to the principles before declared; in which further proceedings, should it appear that the said case of Shumate &c. v. Hickerson has been disposed of in respect to the other distributees of Joseph Hickerson, the court will proceed with this cause to a final decree, as it would have done, had it been originally proper so to proceed while the said suit of Shumate &c. v. Hickerson was pending undetermined.

†Legatees—Over-Payment—Refunding to Executor—Admission of Assets.—If an executor voluntarily pays a legacy, he cannot afterwards maintain a bill to compel a legatee to refund, unless it becomes necessary for the discharge of debts, even though the executor has made such over-payment under the impression that he can collect a large debt supposed to be due the estate, and without his fault it was never collected. But such over-payment of one legatee will not be regarded as an admission of assets in his hands, so as to require him to pay to others more than what is coming to them of the amount actually received by him. Anderson v. Piercy, 20 W. Va. 328, citing the principal case. See Same—Same—Same—Mistake of Law.—Where an administrator voluntarily pays money to a distributee of his intestate, with full knowledge of the facts, but under a mistake of law, he cannot recover it unless the same be necessary for the payment of the debts of the intestate. Shriver v. Garrison, 30 W. Va. 476, 4 S. E. Rep. 671, citing the principal case. See the principal case cited in Scott v. Ashlin, 86 Va. 588, 10 S. E. Rep. 751.

In Dunn v. Renick, 40 W. Va. 356, 22 S. E. Rep. 69, the court said: "An executor cannot recover a voluntary payment to a legatee when deficiency appears. Davis v. Newman, 2 Rob. 664; 2 Lomax Ex'rs 173; 1 Rep. Leg. 456."

In Anderson v. Piercy, 20 W. Va. 342, the court said: "As these payments were made by the executor to these legatees voluntarily, and the refunding of these sums were not necessary for the discharge of debts, on the principle which we have laid down and the authority of Davis v. Newman, 2 Rob. 664, it was error for the court to decree the repayment to the executor by the legatees of the sums, which they had received in excess of what was coming to them."

Same—Same—Same—Principal Case Distinguished.—Where an administrator, out of the intestate's assets, voluntarily pays debts of inferior class in preference to debts of higher class, and there is a deficiency of assets, he is not entitled to have the creditors so paid refund. The case has no analogy to the case of an executor paying legacies before paying the debts, where the executor is entitled to be substituted to the creditors' right to have the legatees refund. Findlay v. Trigg, 83 Va. 546, 3 S. E. Rep. 142, citing the principal case; Lewis v. Overby, 81 Gratt. 601. The principal case is cited in this connection in Leake v. Leake, 75 Va. 807. See Gallego v. Atty. Gen., 3 Leigh 451.

In Claycomb v. Claycomb, 10 Gratt. 592, it is said: "In the balance reported to be due, and decreed to be paid, to the executor, some small payments of debts and expenses of administration are included. But these payments were made after the residuary estate had been paid and delivered to the legatees. So that the doctrine recognized in Davis v. Newman, 2 Rob. 664, can have no application to this case. We mean, however, to indicate no opinion upon the question whether that doctrine would apply to the case if the facts were otherwise."

Same—Same—Same—Principal Case Not Overruled.—In Nelson v. Page, 7 Gratt. 160, the court below decreed that legatees whom the executor had voluntarily overpaid should refund, but the question whether an executor can recover of a legatee a surplus paid him on his legacy was not before the court of appeals, and therefore this case cannot be considered as overruling the principal case. The principal case is cited and discussed on this point in Anderson v. Piercy, 20 W. Va. 328, 329.

Same—Same—Same—Extent of Relaxation of English Rule in Virginia and West Virginia.—In Hurst v. Morgan, 31 W. Va. 532, 8 S. E. Rep. 291, the court said: "In England it seems to be settled, by the executor may not have been culpably negligent in respect to the bond, and therefore not chargeable with its whole amount, yet he cannot recover back from the legatees any part of what he had paid them.

This was a case in the circuit court of Orange, between Reuben Newman the executor of James Newman, plaintiff, and authorities, that a legatee is not bound to refund at the suit of the executor, unless the payment by him was compulsory, or unless the deficiency was created by debts which did not appear until after the payment of the legacy, in either of which cases the executor might compel the legatee to refund the excess paid on the legacy. See Toll. Ex'rs 341; 2 Fonbl. Eq. 376; Coppin v. Coppin, 2 P. Wms. 296; Orr v. Kaines, 2 Ves. Sr. 194. But the general spirit of the decision in Virginia and West Virginia has relaxed much of the severity of the ancient English cases when no fraud or misconduct is imputed to the executor. See Jones' Ex'r v. Williams, 2 Call 103, top. p. 86, and Burnley v. Lambert, 1 Wash. (Va.) 313; Gallego's Ex'rs v. Lambert (Tucker's opinion), 3 Leigh 465. I am therefore of the opinion that there is no inflexible rule which refuses to an executor, under any circumstances, the right to recover back from a legatee an excess of advancements which may have been made to him, even when the deficiency was created by debts which appeared before the payment of the legacy, and the payment was voluntary; but in such case the executor will have to make out a very strong case to rebut the almost conclusive presumption that he had a sufficiency of assets to justify the payment of the legacy, which arises from the mere fact that he has paid the legacy. As an instance where the law would permit an executor to recover, I may put the case where the assets were apparently abundant when the legacy was paid, but were subsequently rendered deficient by a general and destructive fire. See Miller v. Rice, 1 Rand. (Va.) 438. The general rule is as laid down in English cases quoted above, and, to justify a departure from this general rule, the executor must show that in the execution of the will he has done everything which a prudent man ought to have done, and has done nothing that a cautious man ought not to have done; and it will not suffice to show that he has been guilty of no fraud, but has acted bona fide and with honest intentions. That the English rule has not been relaxed in Virginia or West Virginia beyond what is above stated, abundantly appears from the cases of Davis v. Newman, 2 Rob. (Va.) 664; Nelson v. Page, 7 Gratt. 160; Anderson v. Piercy, 20 W. Va. 282, and Shriver v. Garrison, 30 W. Va. 456, 4 S. E. Rep. 662. See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

Executors—Right to Grant Indulgence.—Where a debt is due to the testator from a perfectly solvent party and is in no way risked by the indulgence of the executor, he has a large discretion in granting indulgence on such debt, as under many circumstances such a debt, if collected, could not be at once paid out, and the executor knows best the needs of the estate for money, the court would not hold him responsible for the not collecting of such a debt promptly, provided it remained a perfectly good debt. Anderson v. Piercy, 20 W. Va. 286, citing the principal case.

665 Thomas Davis and other legatees of the *testator, defendants, wherein the legatees sought to charge the executor with a debt due to the testator from Thomas Macon, which had been lost, and the executor sought to recover back money which he had paid the legatees under an impression that the debt due from Macon would be collected. The decree of the circuit court of Orange was in favour of the executor, discharging him from liability for the debt, and decreeing over in his favour against the legatees for the money overpaid. Upon an appeal from this decree, the cause was elaborately argued by Stanard for the appellants, and by G. N. Johnson and Patton for the appellee, as well in regard to the facts, as upon several principles of law. In the following opinion there is a statement of the facts, so far as is material to understand the point adjudged, and a review also of such of the authorities cited on either side as are applicable to that point.

ALLEN, J. The testator, after making large specific bequests, directed the residue of his estate to be divided into six parts, of which the executor was to have one, and the remaining five were divided among his children and grandchildren. He owed no debts, and the executor proceeded to make sundry payments to the five legatees. The payments were voluntary; but, as it is alleged, were made under a mistake of fact as to the value of the assets. When the money was paid, all parties supposed that a bond given by Thomas Macon to the testator in his lifetime for a large amount, was good and would be collected; and the executor, in settling with the legatees, acted under that impression. The bond has turned out to be unavailing. Macon, though in the possession of an immense estate at the testator's death, was in truth greatly embarrassed, and subsequently gave deeds of trust which exhausted all his property. There being no creditors of 666 the testator *the executor now seeks to recover back for his own benefit the sums overpaid to the legatees.

In 1 Roper on Legacies 315, it is said to be a rule in equity, to presume, when an executor voluntarily pays one or more legacies, that he has received sufficient assets to discharge the rest; and although the fact be otherwise, not to admit evidence to that effect. In such cases, therefore, the executor will be under the necessity to make up the deficiency with his own money, since he will not be permitted to institute proceedings (except in particular instances) against the legatees so paid, to oblige them to refund. See also 2 Lomax's Digest 173; 2 Williams on Ex'ors 892; 1 Eq. Ca. Abr. 239. The cases referred to by Roper, of Noel v. Robinson, 1 Vern. 94, Newman v. Barton, 2 Vern. 205, Coppin v. Coppin, 2 P. Wms. 292, and Orr v. Kaines, 2 Ves. sen. 194, seem to me fully to sustain the position that in England, where the executor has made a voluntary payment, he cannot compel the legatee to refund: though there may be good reason to doubt whether they fully justify the position that such payment is an admission of assets sufficient to pay all the rest of the legatees, and that, though the fact may be otherwise, equity will not admit evidence to that effect. The authority for this proposition is the opinion of sir John Strange, master of the rolls, in 2 Ves. sen. 194. That opinion has been reviewed by president Tucker in Gallego's ex'ors v. Attorney General, 3 Leigh 488, and he there shews, that sir John Strange merely says such payment furnishes a presumption of the sufficiency of assets to pay the rest of the legacies, but does not say the presumption is conclusive. In the opinion of president Tucker, such presumptions, like all others, are liable to be rebutted, and although an executor may have been willing to encounter the hazard of paying one, it furnishes no reason for being compelled to pay the rest out of his own pocket.

667 *I should not consider such a payment to one as conclusively establishing the executor's liability to all the rest, although the assets were deficient originally; because that would conflict with the spirit of our laws and adjudications. In England, the executor is personally bound if he fails to plead. A judgment against him on any plea except plene administravit, or a plea admitting assets to a sum certain and riens ultra, is conclusive on him that he has assets to satisfy such judgment. Our Statute (1 R. C. p. 384, ch. 104, § 36,) has altered the law in this respect, and a failure to plead, or mispleading, subjects him to no personal responsibility. To hold that a voluntary payment to one legatee is an implied admission of assets sufficient to pay all, would be giving to such implied admission in pais an effect to which the statute has declared an admission on record shall not be entitled. For, by any other than the plea of plene administravit, he was held to admit assets. 1 Wms. Saund. 335, note 10.

But as between the executor and the legatee who has been paid, the cases are decisive that he shall not recover back the payment if voluntarily made. And no case has been cited which shews that such a bill has ever been sustained in England. It is certainly not shewn by those cited from 1 P. Wms. 495, and 2 P. Wms. 447. In Virginia the question has never arisen. Burnley v. Lambert, 1 Wash. 308, was a suit by the legatee to recover slaves bequeathed to him, and which had been seized and sold on an execution against the executor after he had assented to the legacy. Judge Pendleton, after deciding that the assent of the executor to the legacy vested the legal title in the legatee, which could not be divested at law by the creditor, remarks that the creditor is not without remedy; he may follow the assets in the hands of the legatee, or proceed against the executors, in which case the executors have their tee to refund. It does not appear from the report, whether the debt was one of which the executor had no previous notice; and it was unnecessary for the court to enquire into that matter. If it was a debt of which he had no notice before paying away the assets to legatees, he had a right to compel the legatees to refund. Nelthrop v. Biscoe, 1 Ch. Cas. 135.* And as the assets are always bound to the creditor, and he may pursue them in the hands of the legatee even though the testator's effects would have been sufficient to pay both debts and legacies, (1 Vern. 162,) there might be good reason for holding that where the executor paid a legacy with notice of a debt, believing the assets to be sufficient, and they proved insufficient to pay both, he should be permitted to compel the legatee to refund. The legatee takes subject to the liability of being compelled to refund at the suit of a creditor. And where the executor has not been culpable, and is compelled to pay the debt, it seems to me he should be substituted to the rights of the creditor he has paid. So far the strict rule of the english courts might properly be relaxed in conformity with the more liberal spirit of our legislation in regard to executors, and with the principles which led the court to give relief in Miller's ex'ors v. Rice &c., 1 Rand. 438.

Jones v. Williams, 2 Call 102, was a controversy about accounts, and the question could not have arisen; for the money advanced to the distributee was advanced as a loan, to be returned if on a settlement he was not entitled to it; and for that reason the executor was allowed interest on the sum decreed to him.

669 Bowers's ex'or v. Glendenning &c.*, 4 Munf. 219, decides merely that an executor against whom a creditor obtains a decree may compel the legatee to refund.

In Gallego's ex'ors v. Attorney General, 3 Leigh 450, it was decided that where the estate proved deficient by an unexpected depreciation of the property after some of the legatees were fully paid, the unpaid legatees have a right to look to the executors for their ratable proportions of the fund, and are not bound to have recourse to the legatees who were fully paid to compel them to refund. In England, the unsatisfied legatee cannot maintain a suit against the legatee fully paid to compel him to refund, if the executor is solvent. Such judge Tucker lays down to be the rule; and therefore, though he was of opinion in Gallego's ex'ors v. Attorney General that the executors were liable only for the ratable proportion of the legacy, and not for the whole, upon the ground that payment in full to one was an admission of assets sufficient to pay all, he still held, that as the executors were quite solvent, the legatees had no right to call upon those paid to refund. The case did not call for a decision on this point, and the other judges did not notice it. If, as I conceive, the executor who has been made liable at the suit of the creditor can only be permitted to compel the legatee, whom he has voluntarily paid, to refund, by substituting him to the rights of the creditor, who could have proceeded in the first instance against the assets; where it is shewn that no such original right to charge the assets exists, there is no right to which the executor can be substituted.

But even if, in a case where there was an original deficiency of assets, (as in Gallego's ex'ors v. Attorney General) it should be held that the executor, having through mistake paid one legatee in full, and having afterwards been compelled to pay the proportions of the others out of his 670 own pocket, might compel the legatee overpaid to refund; the case would still fall short of that under consideration. Here the executor has not been called upon by a creditor to make good assets improperly paid away, or by an unpaid legatee to pay him a ratable proportion of his legacy out of his own pocket: he is seeking to recover for his own benefit alone. To sustain his claim to such a recovery would be against the whole series of authorities in England, commencing at an early period, and without the support of a single authority or dictum in our own courts.

It is the duty of the executor to make himself acquainted with the condition of the estate. The means are in his own hands, and if he neglects to avail himself of them it is his own fault. He is not compelled to pay the legatees until the debts are discharged, and until he has ascertained the precise extent of the assets. He can decline paying except under the decree of a court, and then he is entitled to call upon the legatee to refund if the estate was originally deficient; and he may with us always require a refunding bond. If, without using any of these precautions, he voluntarily pays the legatee, the latter has a right to consider the money as his own; subject, it is true, to be called upon to refund at the suit of creditors, or of an unpaid legatee if the assets were originally deficient. But these are contingencies too remote in his apprehension, when a payment has been made to him under such circumstances, to have any influence on his conduct. The hardship of the case is greater upon the legatee than the executor. He has been in no default. No duty was imposed upon him to examine into the state and condition of the assets. He receives what a payment under such circumstances has impressed him with a conviction he will never be called upon to refund. Such unexpected additions to men's fortunes are frequently spent without much consideration; wasted in the gratification of some want to which the *legacy has given birth, or released to some more needy relative. It would be the grossest injustice, under such circumstances, to permit the executor, who had thus misled him by his negligence or inattention to his duties, to compel him at some distant day to refund the money. The case of a legatee, and as between him and the executor, seems to me much stronger than the cases of Brisbane v. Dacres, 5 Taunt. 144, 1 Eng. C. L. Rep. 43, and Skyring v. Greenwood, 4 Barn. & Cress. 281, 10 Eng. C. L. Rep. 335, in the first of which cases Gibbs, J., remarked, that he who receives money so paid "has a right to consider it as his without dispute: he spends it in confidence that it is his; and it would be most mischievous and unjust, if he who has acquiesced in the right by such voluntary payment, should be at liberty, at any time within the statute of limitations, to rip up the matter and recover back the money."

*Note by the reporter.—In the late case of March v. Russell, 8 Mylne & Craig 81, 14 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. p. 40, the point was made, "that assets cannot be followed in the hands of legatees to whom they have been handed over by the personal representative in ignorance of the demands of creditors which existed at the time;" but lord Cottenham said, the proposition could not be maintained; it was contrary to the established rule of the court from the earliest period.

The only modifications of the general rule which our laws seem to call for, are those already indicated. A payment to one in full shall not be construed into an admission of assets sufficient to pay all: it merely furnishes a strong presumption, which may be rebutted by proof of an original deficiency. And in all cases where the executor is compelled to pay a creditor, he shall, upon the principle of substitution, have the right to compel the legatee to refund, and this although he had notice of the debt at the time of payment; unless he has been guilty of culpable neglect of his duty to inform himself of the condition of the estate. But where he has not been subjected to liability at the suit of a creditor, he shall not be permitted to recover back, for his own benefit, what he has voluntarily paid to the legatee.

On the particular circumstances attending this payment, the case, it seems to me, is still stronger against the executor. The testator died in March 1816. The *will was proved in a short time thereafter, and the executor qualified in October following: but he took possession of the estate, and acted as executor, immediately after the death of the testator, managing the estate according to the directions of the will. In November 1816, the executor filed the bill in the present cause. The object contemplated in filing it was clearly nothing more than a division of the slaves. I should not consider this as affecting the validity of the settlement and decree, if free from other objections. The bill made the will an exhibit; there was a prayer for general relief; the answers consented to a division of whatever property was by the will directed to be divided; and all parties at a subsequent period proceeded to the account, without any exception or objection to the propriety of such settlement under the pleadings in the cause. After this, it seems to me to be too late to start the objection here. On the coming in of the answers, commissioners were appointed to divide the slaves, who made the division in January 1817. This being done, no farther proceedings were had in the cause until August 1825, when it was ordered (on whose motion does not appear) that the report of the division should be confirmed, and that the commissioners should settle the executorial account. In the meantime, and as early as September 1817, an informal statement and settlement of the accounts was made at the instance of the executor. At this time the executor had fully informed himself of the condition of the estate. There were no debts to pay; nothing to do but to ascertain the amount and pay the legatees their proportions. Charging the bond due from Macon to the testator as part of the available assets, these proportions were ascertained, and the executor proceeded to make payments. That the condition of the estate was fully known to the executor at that time, is manifest from a comparison of the statement made in 1817, with the *settlement returned and the cause under the order of 1825. The items correspond throughout; and the only difference between them arises out of the Macon bond, which was not estimated as part of the assets at the last settlement. Excluding this bond, the executor had overpaid; and this overpayment he seeks to recover back, because the bond was estimated as part of the available assets under a mistaken impression that Macon was perfectly solvent; an opinion entertained as well by the legatees as the executor. Conceding this to be the fact, how does it benefit the executor? He had control of the bond, and it was his duty to satisfy himself of the solvency of the obligor. The legatees were passive. They made no misrepresentation. It does not appear that they were even urgent for the payment of their legacies. The estate being entirely free from debt, it was the duty of the executor (and his interest too, he being entitled to much the largest portion) to settle up and pay the legatees in the course of the year. This bond constituted a large portion of the assets. He could not have been charged with it until he had collected it. If he did not intend to risk the solvency of the obligor, he should have instituted suit upon it, or at least excluded it from the statement on the faith of which the legatees received the payments. Under these circumstances, and after having held it up for eighteen months from the probat of the will, and then brought it into the account, his conduct was tantamount to a representation to the legatees that the bond was good, and that he as executor was willing to take it. The defendants insist in their answers that there was an express agreement to that effect; and the evidence, if it does not establish it, tends to prove it. But the transaction speaks for itself. He charged himself with the bond; and the legatees, on the faith of this act, voluntary on his part, and after full time to satisfy himself of the solvency of the 674 *obligor, received what he thus induced them to believe was their own. Supposing he made an innocent mistake, does that give him a right, not only to discharge himself, but to charge others who were misled by him?

Though I should not consider him guilty of such laches in failing to collect the bond as to render him responsible for its whole amount, yet the question assumes a very different aspect when he seeks to recover back, for his own benefit, what he has paid on account of it. The obligor, at the death of the testator, and when the executor qualified, was in possession of a very large estate; his embarrassments were unknown in the neighbourhood. Who can say, that if the executor had proceeded promptly to enforce payment, the bond would not have been secured or paid? In December 1817 the deed of trust from Macon was recorded, having been executed by him in June previous. But at what time the debts were all contracted does not distinctly appear. Some of them may have been, and probably were, incurred after the death of the testator and the qualification of the executor. It clearly appears that he was solicitous to maintain his credit. The debt due the testator was but a trifle in comparison with the immense estate in his possession and to all appearance unincumbered. If the executor had insisted on payment within the year when he was bound to settle up, can any one undertake to say that the debt would not have been paid or secured? All that the record shews him to have done was to make an application to the debtor. In the exercise of a proper discretion, the executor may abstain from calling in debts well secured. Where, from the condition of the estate, it cannot be distributed or paid out in consequence of controverted claims, much latitude of discretion may be allowed; and if without any culpable default of the executor, loss should result from the 675 insolvency *of debtors supposed to be good, the circumstances may exempt him from liability. Here the general impression of the solvency of the debtor may be a sufficient defence against the charge of culpable negligence, and relieve the executor from the payment of the whole amount, but does not, as it seems to me, furnish any claim to recover back what he has paid.

It has been contended that this was a compulsory payment, in which case the executor may recover back. Newman v. Barton, 2 Vern. 205. There is nothing in the record to justify this position. There was a suit instituted by himself, in which, for the reasons already given, it was competent to go on and settle the estate. But he paid before any settlement was made in that suit, when in fact no settlement was contemplated, and upon a statement voluntarily furnished by himself.

Upon the whole, without considering the effect of the statute of limitations on the claim of the executor, (though the great delay furnishes another strong circumstance against this pretension) it seems to me that both the rules of law and the particular circumstances of this case should preclude his recovery.

Evidence—Admissions.†—The general rule, that the admission of one person cannot be given in evidence against another, adverted to by BALDWIN, J. Same—Codefendants—Answer of One No Evidence against Another—Cases Approved.—It is a general rule, that the answer of one defendant in chancery is not evidence against his codefendant. From this rule there is no exception of the answer of an assignor; not even though the bond assigned be alleged to have been given on a gaming consideration. The fact of its being on such consideration cannot be established against a defendant who is the assignee, by the answer of his codefendant the obligee and assignor. *Accord. Hoopes v. *He had been counsel for the appellant.

†Evidence—Assignor—Declarations.—The declarations of an assignor of a chose in action cannot be given in evidence against the party who had previously acquired his title by assignment from him. It would be vicious and dangerous to permit the assignor to defeat the right or title which he had conveyed or assigned to another. Ginter v. Breeden, 90 Va. 570, 19 S. E. Under such circumstances, the only question is as to the amount of the obligor's liability to the assignee. Is it the whole amount of the bond, or is it the sum paid by the assignee to the assignor for the assignment? Per BALDWIN, J., it is the former; per ALLEN, J., the latter.

Same—Same—Decree Over for Obligor in Gaming Bond against Obligee.—In an injunction suit by the obligor in a gaming security against the obligee and assignee, if the gaming consideration be admitted by the obligee's answer, but not proved by any competent evidence against the assignee, the injunction will be dissolved and the bill dismissed as to the assignee, but not as to the obligee. As to him the cause will be retained until payment by the obligor to the assignee of the money due the latter, in order that a decree may then be rendered therefor in favour of the obligor against the obligee.

677 *A bond of Hugh Pettit to James F. Jennings for 1000 dollars, dated the 5th of October 1833 and payable 12 months after date, having been assigned to Richmond Terrell, Pettit, on the 27th of January 1834, made a deed of trust conveying a tract of land in Fluvanna to Abraham Shepherd, in trust for the purpose of securing the payment of the bond to Terrell. Default being made in paying the bond, the land was immediately advertised under the deed. Whereupon, to wit, in October 1834, Pettit exhibited a bill of injunction against Jennings, Shepherd and Terrell, alleging that the whole consideration of the bond was for money won of him by Jennings at cards, and that William Overton, who acted for Terrell in procuring the deed of trust, was told by him (Pettit) and by others that such was the consideration. The bill prayed for a discovery by Jennings of the consideration, an injunction to restrain a sale under the deed, and a decree cancelling the bond and deed.

Terrell answered, that in January 1834 he put into the hands of Overton the sum of 1000 dollars, with a request that he would employ the same for his (Terrell's) benefit; and in a month or two afterwards he was informed by Overton of his purchase of the bond from Pettit to Jennings, the assignment thereof to him (Terrell), and the deed of trust to secure the same.

Jennings answered that the bond was given for a gaming consideration, but that Overton, so far as he knew, was not informed as to the consideration of the bond; that Overton refused to purchase the bond until he could see Pettit; that the bond was not executed till the day of its transfer; that the sale to Overton as agent of Terrell was made at the solicitation of Pettit, on an agreement between him (Jennings) and Pettit, that he (Pettit) should receive a part of the money obtained for the bond; that before the transfer was made, 678 Pettit told *Overton, in the presence of him (Jennings), that the bond was given for money borrowed, and he would pay it without offset, and secure it by deed of trust; and that Pettit did actually receive 600 dollars of the amount received for the bond.

There were depositions to prove that Pettit actually receive the 600 dollars, or about that amount; and it seemed from the testimony of one witness, that a bond had been given therefor by Pettit to Jennings, as for money borrowed by the former from the latter. In the opinion of the court of appeals, the evidence contained in the depositions was not sufficient to establish that the bond of 1000 dollars from Pettit to Jennings was given on a gaming consideration. One witness deposed that he had seen Jennings and Pettit play cards: another, that he suspected the bond was on a gaming consideration, and admonished Overton to be on his guard in purchasing it. Overton himself deposed, that in his first conversation with Pettit, Pettit told him to be cautious how he purchased any claim of Jennings, as they had been gambling, and Jennings had cheated him and won money of him; at any rate to see him (Pettit) before he made the purchase. In consequence of this conversation, Overton, on the day the bond was transferred, wrote a paper which Pettit signed, in these words: "I acknowledge that my bond held by James F. Jennings for 1000 dollars, dated the 5th day of October 1833, payable 12 months after date, is justly due, and if Richmond Terrell should buy the said bond, I will pay it without offset. Hugh Pettit jr. 27 January 1834."

The circuit court of Fluvanna, on the 9th of September 1835, decreed that the injunction be dissolved and the bill dismissed, and that the plaintiff should pay Terrell his costs.

From this decree, on the petition of Pettit, an appeal was allowed.

679 *The cause was elaborately argued by Stanard for the appellant, by Steger and G. N. Johnson for Terrell, and by Lyons for Jennings. But the points made and the authorities cited are so fully examined in the following opinions, that it is thought not proper to take up the space that would be occupied in an attempt to report the argument.

BALDWIN, J. It is unquestionable as a general rule, that the admission of one person cannot be given in evidence against another. There are various exceptions to the rule, of which I need notice here only such as arise out of a connexion of interest between the person making the admission and him against whom it is offered. In solving a question as to the admissibility of such evidence, regard must be had to the nature of the connecting interest, and the time of making the admission. The nature of the connecting interest may be that of a joint ownership or liability, or that of a derivation of title of one several owner from or through another. In the former case, the ownership or liability must be strictly joint, as that of joint tenants or copartners; and there the admission of one is treated as the admission of both: a mere community of interests, as that of tenants in common, is not sufficient. Dan &c. v. Brown, 4 Cowen 483, 493. But there is this difference between a joint and a derivative interest: in the former, the joint interest to be affected must be a subsisting one at the time of the admission; in the latter, the derivative interest to be affected must be acquired subsequently to the admission.

Whether the person making the admission, and the party against whom it is offered, be connected by a joint ownership or liability, or by the transmission of a several title from the former to the latter, the interest of the former must be a subsisting one at the time of the admission. If 680 at the time of making it he has *parted from his interest, his admission is not legal evidence against him to whom it has passed. Upon this point the authorities are clear and numerous; and as respects the vendor of property, real or personal, or the assignor of a chose in action, there has been no case, so far as my information extends, allowing his declarations to be given in evidence against a party who had previously acquired his title. Indeed the propriety of rejecting such evidence would seem too obvious to require the support of authority. It would be manifestly of dangerous tendency to permit the vendor or assignor thus to defeat the right or title which he had conveyed or transferred to another; and unreasonable to deprive the latter of the protection to be derived from cross examination. Nor is this rule of exclusion varied by the circumstance that the vendor or assignor is bound by a warranty, express or implied, to assure the title or interest which he has conveyed or transferred. Such contingent liability does not furnish a sufficient security against indiscretion or fraud, to the prejudice of the derivative owner; there not being a complete identity of interest, and the former owner being divested, in a great measure, of the vigilance, circumspection and forethought incidental to the immediate ownership, enjoyment and control of the subject. It is from this consideration, doubtless, that we find the exclusion of admissions by a vendor or assignor, made after his sale or assignment, laid down in the books without exception or qualification; and that the rule has been applied in various cases notwithstanding the contingent liability of the vendor or assignor. Wilcox v. Pearman, 9 Leigh 144; Packer v. Gonsalus, 1 Serg. & Rawle 536; Babb v. Clemson, 12 Serg. & Rawle 328.

What I have said has reference to admissions in pais, whether verbal or written; or in a former suit, by answer or otherwise, to which the person against whom the evidence is offered was not a party. The same *principles must govern an admission in the answer of one defendant in a pending suit, offered as evidence against his codefendant. Where there is a connexion of interest between the two defendants arising out of the relation of vendor and vendee, or assignor and assignee, the admission in the answer must necessarily have been made after the vendor or assignor has parted from his interest. There is no consideration of justice or policy which requires the reception of such evidence. Accordingly, we find it laid down in the books, in the strongest terms, that the answer of one defendant is not evidence against his codefendant; and I am aware of no authority which makes the answer of a vendor or assignor an exception from the general rule. On the contrary, in Phoenix v. The assignees of Ingraham, 5 Johns. R. 426, and other cases, such an admission is placed upon the same footing as an admission in pais; and in that case it was held that no declarations, in whatever form, of a party to a sale or transfer, going to destroy and take away the vested rights of another, can ex post facto work that consequence, or be regarded as evidence against the vendee or assignee. No authority to the contrary has been produced by the appellant's counsel, except a passage in Greenleaf's Law of Evidence, p. 210, § 178, where it is said: "In general the answer of one defendant in chancery cannot be read in evidence against his codefendant, the reason being, that as there is no issue between them, there can have been no opportunity for cross examination. But this rule does not apply to cases where the defendant claims through him whose answer is offered in evidence; nor to cases where they have a joint interest, either as partners or otherwise, in the transaction." For the propositions in this last sentence, the learned author refers to Field &c. v. Holland &c., 6 Cranch 8, 24, and Clark's ex'ors v. Van Riemsdyk, 9 Cranch 153, 156. The latter case relates only to the *last proposition; and Field &c. v. Holland &c. it will be found, does not sustain the first. The marginal note of the reporter is so, but it is wrong; no such doctrine is asserted in that case.

The case of Field &c. v. Holland &c. was briefly this: The plaintiffs Field &c. filed their bill in equity to set aside a sale of a tract of land in Georgia, made by the sheriff under executions which issued upon judgments recovered by Holland against Cox; which tract of land, after the judgments, but before the levy of the executions, was sold by Cox to the plaintiffs. The equity in the bill was, that the judgments were discharged before the levy of the executions, by certain dealings and transactions between Holland and Cox; who, together with Milton and others, the purchasers at the sheriff's sale, were made defendants: and the merits of the case turned upon the truth of that allegation, which the bill expressly required Holland to answer, and as to which it called upon him for a discovery. Holland answered denying the allegation; and the question was as to the effect of his answer. The court, in its opinion delivered by chief justice Marshall, held that the answer of Holland responsive to the bill was evidence against the plaintiffs, and upon that and the other evidence in the cause dismissed the bill, not only as to Holland, but also as to Milton and others, the purchasers under the executions, who of course claimed under Holland.

The principle of this decision is not that the answer of a defendant is evidence for the plaintiff against a codefendant, but that, when responsive to the bill, it is evidence against the plaintiff for the responding defendant, and enures to the benefit of his codefendant claiming under him, when it destroys the foundation of the plaintiff's claim. The language of the court is as follows: "Neither is it to be admitted that the answer of Holland is not testimony against the plaintiffs. He is the party against whom the fact that the judgments 683 were discharged is to be established, and against whom it is to operate. This fact when established, it is true, affects the purchasers also; but it affects them consequentially, and through him. It affects them as representing him. Consequently, when the fact is established against or for him, it binds them. The plaintiffs themselves call upon Holland for a discovery. They aver that the judgments were discharged, and expressly require him to answer this allegation. They cannot now be allowed to say that this answer is no testimony." It will be seen that the reasoning of the court is at first somewhat indefinite; I presume, for the purpose of avoiding the very inference which has been erroneously drawn from it. Its object was to shew, in the first place, that the fact of the payment or nonpayment of the judgments, when properly established, would not only be evidence for or against the plaintiff therein, but would operate for or against the purchasers under the authority thereof; at the same time avoiding the designation of the mode by which the fact, whether affirmative or negative, was to be established; and then to shew that in the case before the court it was established negatively, by the responsive answer of the defendant Holland. There could be no propriety in intimating any opinion as to what would be the effect of a directly opposite state of facts, to wit, an admission by the defendant Holland, in his answer, of the allegation in the bill; and in fact no such opinion was intimated.

A plaintiff is put to no disadvantage by not being allowed to read the answer of one defendant against another, where they are not identified in interest. He is placed upon fair ground when permitted to encounter each with the appropriate pleadings and proofs. It is not his having associated them as parties that deprives him of the testimony of one against the other as a witness; but because the one called on is incompetent or privileged by reason of his interest. If such be not the 684 *fact, the plaintiff may examine him as a witness: and if it be the fact, then his testimony can avail the plaintiff nothing, unless he has admitted in his answer the allegation sought to be proved. When he has so admitted it, he is no longer privileged, for he has already given evidence against himself; and where his codefendant is a mere claimant under him, an objection to his competency can come only from the plaintiff. No failure of justice, therefore, results from rejecting the answer of one defendant as evidence against his codefendant; and if received, it would be evidence in the most objectionable form. An admission in an answer is something more than evidence: it is a concessum in pleading, which requires no corroborating, and allows of no countervailing proofs. If received against a codefendant, it ought to be with the same force and effect as against the respondent; otherwise it operates as a deposition, but a deposition of an anomalous character, one which denies the important privilege of cross examination. Either way, whether operating as a pleading or a deposition, it would place an assignee or vendee completely in the power of his assignor or vendor, and subject him to the danger of being made the helpless victim of a fraudulent collusion.

There is nothing in the provisions or policy of the statute against gaming which can affect this question. That statute, it is true, gives a discovery against the party who has a knowledge of the material facts; but it does not make the discovery, when obtained, evidence against others, nor alter the rules of pleading and evidence beyond its express enactments. It is enough that it avoids the security in the hands of an innocent assignee, when the fact is ascertained: it would be too much to prevent him from putting the fact in issue, and requiring its proof, so far as it affects him, by legal testimony.

685 *It is clear, therefore, to my mind, that the answer of the defendant Jennings cannot be read against his assignee and codefendant Terrell, to prove that the bond of the plaintiff Pettit was executed for a gaming consideration. If the question were even doubtful upon principle, I would consider it as settled by authority.

In the case of Dade's adm'r v. Madison, 5 Leigh 401, Madison filed his bill against Dade and Tankersley, to be relieved against a judgment on an accepted order, drawn by Dade in favour of Tankersley, and accepted by Madison. The bill alleged that the order was drawn for money won by Dade from Madison at unlawful gaming; which allegation was admitted by Dade, but put in issue by Tankersley. And the court, after full consideration, held that the answer of the defendant Dade was not evidence against his codefendant Tankersley, to prove the unlawful consideration of Madison's acceptance. The case cannot be distinguished in principle for the one before us. Madison's acceptance was a security for a debt due from him to Dade, which debt Dade by his order assigned to Tankersley. Dade by his answer admitted the unlawful consideration of the debt, and that admission was not permitted to affect his assignee and codefendant Tankersley. In the case of Hoomes v. Smock, 1 Wash. 389, this court had previously held that the answer of the obligee in a bond, admitting the bond to have been executed for money won at unlawful gaming, was improper evidence against his assignee and codefendant. In accordance with these decisions is the case of Bartlett v. Marshall, 2 Bibb 470.

If, however, it had been fully proved, by evidence unobjectionable on the part of the defendant Terrell, that the bond of the plaintiff was given for a gaming consideration, still it is clear that he would not be entitled to the relief which he seeks against that defendant. The evidence is entirely satisfactory to prove that neither Terrell nor his agent, previous to the assignment of the bond, had any knowledge of its having been executed for money won at play; and that the agent was induced to purchase it by the plaintiff's assurances that there was no objection to its payment, and that it would be duly paid. Under these circumstances, it is impossible that the plaintiff can be exonerated from his indebtedness to the innocent assignee: and the only question he can be permitted to make is as to the amount of that indebtedness. Is it the whole sum for which he is bound, or is it the sum paid by the assignee to the assignor for the assignment?

At law, there could be no difficulty in this question. There the assignee would recover the whole amount evidenced by the obligation, or nothing. The obligor could not plead that he was not indebted the full amount of the bond, because the assignee had paid a less sum for it to the assignor; nor could he obtain a credit, upon the plea of payment or setoff, for the discount allowed by the assignor to the assignee. How is it in a court of equity?

The plaintiff has not presented the question, either by his bill or his proofs. He has neither charged nor proved, that the consideration for the assignment was less than that for which he bound himself in the obligation. But suppose he had done both; and suppose further that he had set forth the whole case in his bill, stating that the bond was given for money lost at unlawful gaming; that the assignee was ignorant of the fact, but had been induced by the wilful misrepresentations of him the plaintiff, as to the true nature of the consideration, to lay out his money in the purchase of it at a certain discount; that he the plaintiff had conveyed property to a trustee to secure the payment of the debt; and praying an injunction to restrain proceedings for the recovery of more than the sum paid by the assignee to the assignor for the assignment: would such a case be proper for relief in equity? Or, 687 *to make it stronger for the obligor, suppose (contrary to the fact) that he were defendant, instead of plaintiff, in the case before us; that the assignee had come in, upon some ground of equitable jurisdiction, to coerce payment of the debt; and that the obligor had defended himself by setting forth the whole case, as above suggested: would a court of conscience sustain such a defence?

The principle upon which courts of equity act in such cases is not that of compensation in damages to the party deceived and injured, nor of restoring him by retribution to the condition in which he stood previously. They proceed upon the principle that the perpetrator of the fraud shall not be permitted to deny the truth of his own statement, but shall be compelled to make good that which he had represented to be so. Take the familiar example of the owner of an estate standing by and encouraging the purchase of it by another from a third person; the doctrine in regard to which is thus briefly and comprehensively stated by judge Story: "If a man having a title to an estate which is offered for sale, and knowing his title, stands by and encourages the sale, or does not forbid it, and thereby another person is induced to purchase the estate under the supposition that the title is good, the former so standing by and being silent will be bound by the sale, and neither he nor his privies will be at liberty to dispute the validity of the purchase." 1 Story's Eq. 376, § 385. The learned author adds, that "courts of law now act upon the same enlightened principles in regard to personal property; in the transfer of which no technical formalities usually intervene to prevent the application of them. Thus, where it appeared that certain goods of the plaintiff were seized on an execution against a third person (in whose possession they were) and sold to the defendant, and the plaintiff made no objection to the sale though he had 688 *full notice of it, it was held that the facts ought to be left to the jury to consider whether he had not assented to the sale and ceased to be the owner of the property. On this occasion lord Denman, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: 'The rule of law is clear, that where one by his words or conduct wilfully causes another to believe in the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief so as to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from averring against the latter a different state of things as existing at the same time.' Picard v. Sears, 6 Adolph. & Ellis 474."

I can perceive no good reason why a gaming security should form an exception to the general rule on this subject; which rests upon principles of justice equally applicable, whether the debt be void in its inception, or be avoided by payment or release, or by any other matter ex post facto. It is true that a contract or security which is void, either by positive law or upon principles of public policy, is deemed incapable of confirmation; but the doctrine we are considering is not based upon the idea of confirmation, which excludes the supposition of fraud, but upon the fact of fraud in the original representation or subsequent denial, which, to prevent iniquity, is made to operate as an estoppel. Admissions which have been acted upon by others are conclusive upon the party making them, in all cases between him and the person whose conduct he has thus influenced; and the party is estopped, on grounds of public policy and good faith, from repudiating his own representations. Greenleaf on Evid. 240, 241.

If this were not so, then the deluded assignee could recover nothing in an action upon the bond at common law, but would be driven to his action for the deceit; for he would be defeated by a plea of the unlawful consideration of the bond, unless he 689 were permitted to reply the fraudulent conduct of the obligor. That *such a replication would be good, appears from the case of Davis's adm'r v. Thomas &c., 5 Leigh 1. That was an action of debt on a promissory note, brought for the benefit of the holder, in the name of the payee, against the maker, and was tried upon the plea of nil debet. The defendant offered proof that he had paid the contents of the note to the payee, before the transfer thereof to the holder; and to repel that defence, the holder offered proof that he was induced to take the transfer of the note for a valuable consideration, by the maker's previous promise to make payment thereof to him. And this court held, that this evidence to repel the defence of payment was admissible, and that the maker's promise to pay the debt to the holder estopped him from alleging payment to the payee before assignment. Judge Tucker in his opinion, in which the other judges concurred, placed the case expressly upon the same footing as if the security had been "void in its inception, as for gaming, usury, and the like;" and shewed that the matter of estoppel might be replied to a plea in bar, or given in evidence upon the general issue.

The same principle, a fortiori, prevails in equity; for the estoppel, if it may be there so called, is not narrow and technical, but of a liberal and beneficial nature. It works exact justice between the obligor and the assignee, between whom the debt ought to be regarded as free from all objection. In that point of view, the assignee became entitled to the subject itself, and not to the return of the money he invested in it. He has a right, both legal and equitable, to any profit made from the investment, and the obligor has no shadow of equity against him in any degree whatever.

against gaming, which was intended, so far as it avoids the security, to relieve a party guilty of an immoral act, and the public through him, from the injurious consequences of his own indiscretion, 690 *but not to enable him to practise frauds upon others. And so far as regards the mere measure of recovery between the deluded assignee and the fraudulent obligor, though it may be a matter of some importance between them, it can have no influence, as it affects the public, in suppressing the vice of gambling.

The only case cited to prove that the innocent assignee, who has been deluded into the transaction by the misrepresentations of the obligor, is to be restricted in his recovery to the sum paid by him to the assignor, is that of Davison v. Franklin, 1 Barn. & Adolph. 142, 20 Eng. C. L. Rep. 363. There, judgment was confessed upon an obligation, under a warrant of attorney, and a motion subsequently made by the defendant to vacate it, on the ground that the obligation was for a gaming debt; which motion was resisted by the assignee, for whose benefit the judgment had been entered up in the name of the obligee, on the ground that he had been induced to take the assignment by the representations of the obligor that the debt was just and would be paid. And the court referred the case to a master to ascertain the facts, in order, if the allegations on both sides should turn out to be true, to a vacation of the judgment, on condition of payment by the obligor of the sum paid by the assignee to the assignor, with interest thereon. The judgment, it will be observed, was not in a regular action, but according to a practice which prevails in England of taking a warrant of attorney for confession of judgment as a security for money, and entering up the judgment without the necessity of an application to the court or the judge. Over such judgments the court exercises a controlling power, and will vacate them for fraud, or irregularity, or unlawfulness in the consideration, but upon such terms as its discretion may dictate. The decision, therefore, does not indicate what would have been the judgment of the court in a regular 691 action, upon the proper pleadings *in the cause. But we know, upon common law principles, that if the defendant had pleaded the unlawfulness of the consideration, and the plaintiff had replied by way of estoppel, or any matter of confession and avoidance, a judgment either way must have gone to the whole cause of action. Nor does the decision indicate what ought to be the decree of a court of equity under the circumstances of the case, but merely the mode in which the court of law thought proper to exercise its discretion in regard to such securities, of which the court is silently made the organ of the parties. At most, it is a single interlocutory decision of a court of common law, upon its own notion of equitable principles, which is only of persuasive authority here; and which, after a respectful consideration, seems to me to be without just foundation.

That case is moreover open to the observation, that in England bonds are not assignable, and must be sued in the name of the obligee; whereas with us the assignee may acquire the legal right, with the privilege of suing in his own name. But a more important consideration is, that, giving to the decision in that case the utmost weight due to the authority of a foreign tribunal, when directly upon a question before us, still it is contrary to the course of adjudication in Virginia. Buckner &c. v. Smith &c., 1 Wash. 296; Hoomes v. Smock, 1 Wash. 389; Davis's adm'r v. Thomas &c., 5 Leigh 1. The principle of these cases, as will be seen from an inspection of them, is to allow the deluded assignee to enforce payment against the fraudulent obligor for the whole amount of the gaming debt, whether the question arises in a court of law or in a court of equity. They cannot be shaken by the argument that the statute avoids the security in the hands of an innocent assignee for a valuable consideration without notice. So it does, where the case rests upon the original transaction, and the assignee, stepping into the shoes of 692 the obligee, merely *succeeds to his rights: but so it does not, where the assignee is drawn into that relation by the misconduct of the obligor. If it did, then there would be no indebtedness to the amount of a single farthing, and the bond would be a mere blank both at law and in equity.

This distinction is recognized by the cases last cited, and by Kent, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court in Jackson v. Henry, 10 Johns. R. 204, 205. It is also adverted to in Woodson &c. v. Barrett & Co., 2 Hen. & Munf. 88, by Tucker, J., who significantly remarks, that where any instrument is absolutely void in its creation, it cannot be made valid by any subsequent transaction immediately arising out of it; that in the cases of Buckner &c. v. Smith &c. and Hoomes v. Smock, the court relied on particular circumstances in the conduct of the defendants respectively, which distinguished those cases from the general principle; and that there were no such circumstances in the case then before the court, the naked question being, whether the mere want of notice that a bond or other security was given for money won at gaming, entitled the assignee without notice to recover in an action brought upon the bond.

The statute 16 Car. 2, ch. 7, § 3, 7 Bac. Abr. Gaming B., is quite as comprehensive as ours in preventing the recovery of gaming debts of a certain amount. It avoids not only all securities, including bonds, bills, judgments, mortgages &c. for money won at play, but all contracts. Not long after this statute the following case arose. A man wins £100 of another at play. The winner owed Sharp £100 who demanded his debt. The winner brought him to the other of whom he won the money at play, who acknowledged the debt, and gave Sharp a bond for the £100; who, not being privy to the matter, or knowing that it was won at play, accepted the said bond, and for default of payment puts it in suit. The obligor pleads the statute of gaming; and upon a replication of the special 693 matter, and demurrer thereto, *the plaintiff had judgment. Anon., 2 Mod. 279. So in Hussey v. Jacob, 1 Salk. 344, lord Holt said, "If A. wins £100 of B., and, for a debt which A. owes C., he appoints B. to give C. a bond, it is good; C. is an innocent person; and it will be the same thing if A. be bound with him." Stone v. Ware & Smith, 6 Munf. 541, is a like case upon the statute of usury. And in Stewart v. Eden, 2 Caines's R. 150, it was held that a promissory note, given as collateral security for payment of an unsatisfied judgment on a note for a larger amount, tainted with usury, of which the plaintiffs were bona fide holders, could not be impeached on account of the usury.

My opinion therefore is, that the plaintiff has shewn no equity whatever against the defendant Terrell, and consequently that there is no error in the decree of the circuit court, in dissolving the plaintiff's injunction and dismissing his bill as to that defendant. But I think the court erred in dismissing the bill as to the defendant Jennings.

The policy of the statute will be best subserved by treating the obligation, as between the obligor and obligee, as a mere nullity under all circumstances, and preventing the latter from deriving any benefit from it whatever, directly or indirectly. I need not go into the question whether, if the obligor makes a voluntary payment of the money, he can afterwards recover it back by an action at law or a bill in equity, unless upon the terms and within the limitations prescribed by the statute. It is certain that, as between the original parties, a court of law will never enforce, and a court of equity will always relieve against, the unlawful security. When a failure of proof as to the assignee, or a supervening equity between him and the obligor, induces a court of equity to enforce the security in behalf of the assignee, or, what is in effect the same, to suffer it to be enforced;

694 then the court ought *to proceed, if the subject and the parties be properly before it, to administer the justice of the case as between the obligor and the obligee. The latter having, by his contract of assignment, appropriated to himself the avails of the security, and being enabled to retain them by the act of the court, which relieves him incidentally from all responsibility to his assignee, the result is, when the security shall have been enforced against the obligor, that the obligee has obtained from him, in substance though not in form, by means of a compulsory proceeding, satisfaction of a debt destitute of consideration and denounced by the law: but the subject and the parties are still before the court, and I am at a loss to perceive upon what principle the court can refuse redress to the obligor against the obligee.

In Dade's adm'r v. Madison, 5 Leigh 401, already in part stated, the plaintiff Madison having no proof, that could affect the defendant Tankersley, of the unlawful consideration of the security, the injunction was dissolved, and Tankersley allowed to execute his judgment at law against Madison; but the court decreed, that upon Madison's paying the amount of the debt to Tankersley, the other defendant Dade should pay the same amount to Madison: and the decree was affirmed by this court. That case is an authority to prove, as a general proposition, that in an injunction suit by the obligor in a gaming security against the obligee and assignee, if the plaintiff fails to sustain his injunction against the assignee, whereby he is compelled to pay the money, he is entitled to a decree against the obligee; and that not merely for the sum paid by the assignee to the obligee for the assignment, but for the whole amount of the debt. And if there be any difficulty in the part of the case of which I am now speaking, it arises out of two considerations.

In the first place, the evidence in the cause proves that the assignee was induced to take the bond by the 695 *obligor's assurances that the debt was just and would be paid. Does this circumstance oppose any obstacle to giving relief to the obligor against the obligee? I think not. The plaintiff's consent to the assignment, coupled with his subsequent refusal to pay, was, under the circumstances, a wrong to the assignee, but none to the obligee. The assignment was the obligee's own act, and promoted his own views; and how can he complain that it received the consent of the obligor? Between them, such consent can only be treated as the confirmation of a debt which by law is incapable of confirmation. If it were to have the effect of absolving the obligee from responsibility, he could always evade the statute before a rupture with the obligor (whose execution of the bond shews his willingness at first to pay), by prevailing upon him to consent to its assignment. It is the broad locus penitentiae given by law, in some respects, to the imprudent and necessitous, that affords them in a great measure the contemplated protection.

In the next place, it appears from the evidence that about 600 dollars of the money received by the defendant Jennings for the assignment has passed into the hands of the plaintiff. Hence it has been urged, that there was a combination between them to defraud the defendant Terrell, which ought to repel the plaintiff from the equitable forum. But this is mere matter of suspicion; nor is it probable that the successful gambler would not only so surrender the greater part of his gains, but at the same time incur a liability to his assignee for the whole. It is not certainly ascertained whether the 600 dollars was received by the plaintiff from Jennings without accountability, or, as is more probable, to be accounted for as a loan. In either case, Jennings, in a decree against him for the plaintiff, ought to be credited with the money thus in the plaintiff's own hands; and in the latter, should be compelled 696 *to surrender his claim and assurances for the loan. In both, Jennings ought to be debited with the whole amount which the plaintiff will be compelled to pay to Terrell, after such payment shall have been made (as in the case of Dade's adm'r v. Madison); unless in the further proceedings some better reason should appear to the contrary, than the plaintiff's having been involved, to the extent disclosed by the record, in the affair of the assignment; such entanglements of the loser being usually attributable to a sense of shame, or a controlling influence of the winner. The loss to Pettit, and not merely the gain to Jennings, ought to be the measure of redress; because such would have been the preventive justice of the court, if Jennings had not been induced, from a regard to his own convenience, to make the assignment; and because the circulation of such instruments will be best restrained by throwing the consequent sacrifice or loss upon the obligee, instead of the obligor.

I think, therefore, that so much of the decree of the circuit court as dismisses the plaintiff's bill as to the defendant Jennings ought to be reversed, and a reference made to a commissioner, to ascertain what amount of the money received by Jennings from Terrell came to the plaintiff's hands, and what is the accountability, if any, of the plaintiff to Jennings therefor, and what the assurances held by the latter for the same; with leave to those parties, if requested by either, to amend their pleadings, in order that the court may be better enabled to render a final decree between them.

ALLEN, J. The evidence in the record, so far as contained in the depositions of witnesses, does not prove that the bond was given on a gaming consideration. Unless therefore the answer of Jennings can be 697 read as evidence against his codefendant, the bond in the hands of the latter is unimpeached. That it cannot be so used, has been more than once decided by this court in cases arising under the statute against gaming. The question was directly presented and determined in Hoomes v. Smock, 1 Wash. 389, and Dade's adm'r v. Madison, 5 Leigh 401. In the first case, Beverley the assignor, who was made a defendant, stated in his answer that the bond was given in part for a gaming consideration; and there was moreover proof of the fact by one witness. Judge Lyons, in delivering the opinion of the court, remarks upon this, that the answer was contradicted by one witness only, without circumstances to strengthen his testimony; for the answer of the other defendant, as it could not benefit his codefendant, could not injure him. It is somewhat remarkable that after this decision, judge Carr, in Skipwith v. Strother &c., 3 Rand. 214, should have considered the question as still open, and worthy of grave and careful consideration when it should be necessary to decide it. In Dade's adm'r v. Madison the proposition again arose. There the only evidence of the gaming consideration was contained in the answer of Dade. He occupied the precise position of the assignor here. Madison owed him money won at gaming: by his draft in favour of Tankersley, he directed the payment to Tankersley: and Madison accepted the draft. The form which the transaction assumed cannot vary the real nature of it. It was a transfer by Dade to Tankersley of his demand on Madison, which the latter by his acceptance bound himself to pay. Both the judges who gave opinions held that the answer could not be read against the codefendant.

The rule itself dates from the earliest history of chancery proceedings, is founded on the plainest principles of natural justice, and is liable to but few exceptions. In Mitchell v. Webb, Tothill 10, decided in the time of Elizabeth, it was declared that where the defendant by answer accuseth himself and fellow defendant, he is 698 *believed against himself but not against his fellow. It is usually said, that the answer cannot be used against another defendant because he has had no opportunity for cross examination. For this reason, and because the disclosures in an answer are usually made upon searching and leading interrogatories, the answers to which would not be evidence in a deposition, it cannot be used.

This case does not fall within any exception which has been allowed to the general rule. There is no joint interest of the codefendants in the subject, and the admissions were made after the assignor had parted with his interest. Neither did this court, in the cases of Dade's adm'r v. Madison and Hoomes v. Smock, consider that the gaming consideration of the note constituted any exception.

But it has been contended, with much ingenuity, that the necessity of the case should make this an exception: that here the defendant, being interested, could not be examined as a witness; and as the answer is excluded because there is no opportunity of cross examination, that where the party could never be examined as a witness, the principle on which the rule rests does not apply, and the reason ceasing, the rule should also cease.

If the principle is founded in natural justice, the converse of the proposition would seem to be more legitimate. If the right to cross-examine is so essential to the fair and equal administration of justice, then wherever it is shewn that such right cannot be exercised, the evidence should be deemed inadmissible.

This precise objection to the application of the rule excluding the answer of one defendant when offered as evidence against the other, was urged in the case of Morse

v. Royal, 12 Ves. 355. It was argued there, as it has been here, that as the defendant whose answer the plaintiff desired to read was interested and could not be examined as a witness, his answer was necessary; *and that a person appointing as his executor the only witness to the case to be made against him, should not thereby deprive the plaintiff of all his evidence. But the chancellor did not consider that as sufficient to take the case out of the general rule.

There being no proof, therefore, as against Terrell, that the bond was on a gaming consideration, the transaction, as far as he is concerned, stands fair, and the injunction must be dissolved for the whole amount.

This view of the case, if correct, supercedes the necessity of enquiring what is the proper measure of relief in the case of a fair assignee, where the gaming consideration is established by proof. In Hoomes v. Smock and Dade's adm'r v. Madison the question did not arise, because the gaming consideration was not made out by proof as against the assignee. In Buckner &c. v. Smith &c., 1 Wash. .296, there was proof of the consideration; but the point was not noticed. In each of the cases in 1 Wash. a decree over, upon the principle established in Dade's adm'r v. Madison, would have been proper; but it was not asked for: and the court, in Dade's adm'r v. Madison, did not consider this circumstance as an authority against such a decree. The question therefore is still an open one in Virginia. Judge Tucker, in Dade's adm'r v. Madison, remarked, that as every thing stood fair so far as Tankersley was concerned, he was entitled to recover the whole amount of the draft, whatever he might have paid for it. What would have been his opinion if the vice in the consideration had been proved by competent evidence as against Tankersley, does not appear. I do not understand the court, in any of the cases, as affirming the proposition that a security, declared by express law to be void to all intents and purposes whatever, can be held valid in equity to any intent. In both the cases from Washington's Reports, the particular circumstances in the conduct of the defendants rendered them re-700 sponsible. *There was, previous to the assignment, a promise to pay, upon the faith of which the assignee parted with his money. This new promise was the foundation of the recovery; and as, in the absence of proof to the contrary, the face of the bond gives the measure of the consideration paid, the court was bound to give the assignee the whole amount.

An instrument void, by express enactment, in its creation, cannot be made valid by any subsequent transaction arising out of it: Tucker, J., in Woodson &c. v. Barrett & Co., 2 Hen. & Munf. 88. And this constitutes the distinction between such an instrument and a voidable security, as of an infant, which may be confirmed; or a security which, though in its origin neither void nor voidable, has been subsequently discharged. In such cases the subsequent confirmation or assurance given, upon the faith of which another has advanced his money, may be relied upon even at law, and in some cases as an estoppel in pais, to repel the defence, whether made by way of plea or adduced in evidence. Davis's adm'r v. Thomas &c., 5 Leigh 1, was a case of the latter description. The assignee of the promissory note had been induced to purchase by the maker's promising to pay; and he was permitted to shew this, in order to repel the defence of payment to the payee before assignment. The maker, as against such an assignee, had waived his defence, and the instrument being valid, the assignee was entitled to recover the amount. But can this reasoning apply to the case of a security void in its origin? The assignee stands in the position of the assignor: the instrument is equally void in the hands of both, and no subsequent agreement in relation to it can give it validity. In the case of an assignee for value without notice, but to whom no promise or assurance had been made to induce him to purchase, even though a judgment 701 had been confessed, the whole transaction would be avoided. *If this be so, how can it be pretended that a mere promise in pais should have a greater effect than a judgment? that in the one case an estoppel should be worked, so as in effect to repeal the statute, or at least utterly to defeat its policy, whilst in the other the solemn judgment of a court of record shall not preclude an enquiry into the truth?

An anonymous case reported in 2 Mod. 279, and referred to in Buckner &c. v. Smith &c., 1 Wash. 300, would indeed seem to have decided that a promise to pay could be replied. There the winner owed a debt to a third person, and the loser executed to this third person his bond. To a plea of gaming, the plaintiff was permitted to reply that the debt was fairly due to him, and that he was not privy to the gaming. This case arose under the statute of 16 Car. 2, ch. 7, § 3. The statute of 9 Anne, ch. 14, though not so broad as ours, since it omits the word contracts, avoids all securities given for a gaming consideration. Under this statute it is settled that all securities given for money won at play are absolutely void, even in the hands of third persons, though they have paid a valuable consideration for them, and had no notice of their being won at play. Bowyer v. Bampton, 2 Strange 1155; Lowe v. Waller, Dougl. 736; Robinson v. Bland, 2 Burr. 1077; Woodson &c. v. Barrett & Co., 2 Hen. & Munf. 80. In principle what difference is there between those cases and the question under discussion? Is not the loser's promise, under his hand and seal, to pay a fair debt to a third person who has no notice of the gaming, equivalent to his promise in pais made to the assignee? In the one case the third person discharges his immediate debtor in consideration of the bond, or pays his money for a negotiable security: in the other, the assignee parts with his money upon the faith of the promise. In the first case the bond or negotiable instrument is to be held void: in the second it is 702 treated as valid: for *that is the necessary effect of the doctrine that the defendant is estopped from shewing the truth.

It seems to me that at law the defence of gaming could not be met by a replication of a promise to pay. The court must declare the instrument void; and the remedy of the party would be on the promise, in which the measure of damages would be the sum paid upon the faith of it. Where the case occurs in equity, it must be disposed of in conformity with the established rules of that forum. He who asks equity must do it. If another has been induced to part with his money by a false and fraudulent representation, it will reinstate him in the position he occupied before he purchased. This is done by the repayment of what he has advanced, with interest. I think, therefore, that the rule is correctly laid down in the case of Davison v. Franklin, 1 Barn. & Adolph. 142, 20 Eng. C. l. Rep. 363. Though the case was decided in a court of law, it was an application to set aside a judgment confessed under a warrant of attorney, and was addressed to the sound discretion of the court; a discretion to be exercised on equitable principles, so as best to effectuate the ends of justice. Governed by those principles, the court directed the bond and judgment to be given up on repayment of the sum really paid, with interest.

As to the liability of Jennings, the case of Dade's adm'r v. Madison is decisive, and Pettit should have had a decree over against him for the whole amount which he shall be compelled to pay, and shall actually pay, to Terrell in consequence of the assignment. Whether Pettit received a portion of the sum raised by the sale of his bond, or merely borrowed it and executed a new bond for the amount, is left uncertain by the testimony; and an enquiry should have been directed to ascertain how this matter stood.

703 *I think, therefore, as there is no evidence as against Terrell of the gaming consideration, that so much of the decree as dissolves the injunction should be affirmed, and that Terrell should have his costs, as the party substantially prevailing; that the decree should be reversed as to the residue; and that the cause should be remanded in order to a final decree as between Pettit and Jennings.

BROOKE, J. I concur with judge Baldwin in dismissing the bill as to Terrell; and I go farther; I think the bill ought to be dismissed as to Jennings also. I am satisfied by the evidence in the record that Pettit combined with Jennings in misrepresenting to Overton the agent of Terrell the consideration of the bond. I think both joined in representing the bond as for valuable consideration, and that Pettit is entitled to no relief against Jennings in a court of equity, but that if, after paying the amount of the debt to Terrell or his representatives, he has any redress against Jennings, it must be in a court of law, under the third section of the act against gaming. He prays for no relief against Jennings in his bill; nor is the case like that of Dade's adm'r v. Madison, 5 Leigh 401, in which the court decreed in favour of the loser against the winner. There was no combination in that case between the winner and loser to impose the note on Tankersley as a valid note. In the cases of Buckner &c. v. Smith &c., 1 Wash. 296, and Hoomes v. Smock, 1 Wash. 389, no such relief was given. As to the question whether Terrell is to recover no more money than his agent Overton paid for the bond, in none of the cases referred to was such a proposition hinted. There is no evidence in the record of what was given for the bond, nor do the pleadings make any such issue. The presumption, until the contrary appears, is that Terrell gave full value for it.

704 *CABELL, P., expressed his concurrence in the opinion of Baldwin, J. The decree of the court of appeals was entered in the following terms:

The court is of opinion that the appellant has shewn no equity against the defendant Terrell, and consequently that there is no error in so much of the decree of the circuit court as dissolves his injunction and dismisses his bill as to that defendant. It is therefore ordered and decreed that so much of said decree as aforesaid be and the same is hereby affirmed, and that the appellant do pay to the appellee Terrell his costs by him expended in the defence of the appeal aforesaid here. But the court is further of opinion that said decree is erroneous in dismissing the appellant's bill as to the defendant Jennings, instead of retaining the same until payment by the appellant to the defendant Terrell of the principal money and interest in the proceedings mentioned, in order to the rendition then of a decree therefor in favour of the appellant against the defendant Jennings, subject to a credit for such amount of the consideration paid by Terrell to Jennings for the assignment of the appellant's bond, as has come to the hands of the appellant; and that, with a view to such a decree, there ought to have been a reference to a commissioner, to ascertain what amount of the money received by Jennings from Terrell for the assignment did come to the hands of the appellant, and whether it came to his hands as a loan from Jennings, or without accountability therefor, and in the former case what are the assurances held by Jennings for such loan; and that if it should appear to be a loan, Jennings should be compelled to surrender his claim and assurances therefor. It is therefore further ordered and decreed, that so much of said decree of the circuit court as conflicts with the opinion above declared be and the 705 same is *hereby reversed and annulled, and the appellant recover against the appellee Jennings his costs by him expended in the prosecution of his appeal aforesaid here. And the cause is remanded to the said circuit court, for further proceedings therein according to the principles above expressed; and leave is to be there given to the plaintiff and the defendant Jennings, if requested by either, to amend their pleadings, in order that the court may be better enabled to render a final decree between them.

Shirley v. Mutual Assurance Society &c.

(Absent CABELL, P.)

Mutual Assurance Society—Who Are Members.—

Every owner of a present freehold estate in property which has been insured in the Mutual Assurance Society, becomes a member thereof, according to the true spirit of the law and the scheme of the institution.

Same—Lien on Dower Interest—Personal Liability of Widow.—Where a husband insures property in the Mutual Assurance Society and dies seized, his widow takes her dower interest subject to the lien of the society; but she incurs no personal responsibility until dower is assigned her, whereby she becomes a member, and then only for such quotas and premium as accrue while she remains owner of the dower estate, with interest and damages thereon.

Same—Personal Responsibility of Successive Tenants of Premises Insured.—Two tenements, which had been insured in the Mutual Assurance Society, descend, upon the owner's death, to his heirs, and are assigned to his widow for her dower. The widow and her second husband sell and convey her life estate. And the society has a claim for quotas accrued after the death of the first husband; some before the assignment of dower: others afterwards and before the sale of the life estate; and the rest since that sale. It has also a claim for an additional premium accrued during the purchaser's ownership. HELD, 1. The 706 heirs of the first husband are personally responsible for what accrued after *his death and before the assignment of dower.

2. The widow and her second husband are personally liable for what accrued after the assignment of dower and before their sale. 3. The purchaser is personally responsible for what has accrued since, and for no more. 4. The party liable for any principal money is liable for interest and damages thereon.

Same—Lien of—How Enforced.*—The Mutual Assurance Society has a lien upon property insured therein for the principal and interest due the society, but not for damages. This lien is effectual not only against the original member, but against all persons deriving ownership from him, and the property may be sold to satisfy the same. Though one party has the estate for life and another the reversion, the lien will be enforced against the tenement insured by selling the whole fee simple title thereof, and the whole of the tenement, unless from the nature of the property it be practicable and expedient to lay off a portion thereof for sale. Before directing such sale, however, the respective personal liabilities of the several parties chargeable will be ascertained. And if the tenant for life advance the amount chargeable to the reversioner, as well as what is chargeable to himself, there will be no sale of the reversion, but a lien established thereon for reimbursement of the amount so advanced, with interest, to be enforced upon the falling in of the life estate.

Same—Same—Same—Terms of Sale.—If a sale take place, what should be the terms as to cash and credit, and how the deferred instalments should be divided.

Same—Same—Same—Lien on Two Tenements.—Under what circumstances a lien upon two tenements insured may be satisfied by selling only one of them, and applying the proceeds in exoneration of the other.

This was a suit in the circuit court of Spotsylvania, brought by the Mutual Assurance Society against fire on buildings of the state of Virginia, against the heirs of Claiborne Wigglesworth, Lawrence Waugh and Lavinia W. his wife, who was the widow of Wigglesworth, and Thomas Shirley, a purchaser from Waugh and wife of her life estate in two tenements insured before the death of Wigglesworth in the Mutual Assurance Society, and assigned after his death to his widow for her dower in his real estate. The society claimed 174 dollars 97 cents to be due it for quotas and a small additional premium on revaluation of one of the tenements, amounting, with interest to the first of April 1842, to *239 dollars 2 cents. By the decree of the circuit court it was adjudged that Shirley should pay the 239 dollars 2 cents, with interest on the 174 dollars 97 cents from the first of April 1842, and damages at 7½ per centum on the principal and interest. The defendants were ordered to pay the costs. And liberty was reserved to the complainants to apply to the court for further relief. Liberty was also reserved to Shirley to resort to the court for indemnity against the other defendants, or out of the tenements, for so much as the other defendants might be liable for.

From this decree, on the petition of Shirley, an appeal was allowed.

Patton argued the cause for the appellant. The points insisted on and the facts, so far as material, sufficiently appear from the following opinion.

BALDWIN, J. The Mutual Assurance Society is based upon the reciprocal pledges of associated owners, by which the insured property of each is bound to contribute to the security of all. The right to compensation in the event of loss, and the duty of contributing for losses of others, arise out of the fact of ownership. Without ownership there can be no membership, and membership ceases upon the cessation of ownership. Property, however, once pledged continues to be so until destroyed or lawfully withdrawn; and gives to its successive owners the rights, powers and duties of membership. There is, it is true, a personal responsibility as well as a pledge; but the personal responsibility is only for contributions which accrue during ownership, and does not extend to those which accrue before or after.

The contributions of the members consist of premiums, quotas, and additional premiums.

708 *The premium was originally designed to raise a fund for making immediate compensation to owners as losses from fire should occur. The original act of assembly, passed in December 1794, establishing the society, contemplated that the premium should be paid at the time of insurance; but yet, in case of default, authorized the recovery thereof with interest, and the sale of the property therefor. There have been questions as to the liability of a purchaser from a subscriber, and of the property in his hands, for payment of the premium; (Greenhow &c. v. Barton, 1 Munf. 590; Mut. Ass. Soc. v. Stone &c., 3 Leigh 218:) but these need not be further noticed here; there being no claim in the case before us for the original premium, nor any room for such a claim; the regulations of the society, existing at the time of the insurances in question, providing that a declaration for insurance shall not be binding on either party till payment of the premium. Constitution, Rules and Regulations of the Mutual Assurance Society, p. 18, art. 11, § 3.

The quotas were intended to supply any deficiency in the fund raised by the premiums, and were authorized by the same act of 1794, by what is there called a repartition; and also in effect, though not in name, by the acts of February 1809, § 6, 7, and March 1819, § 1. They were substantially additional assessments upon the property insured, and designed to enable the society to keep up a fund the interest of which would be deemed sufficient to pay the annual losses and expenses. A lien for the quotas was given by the original act of 1794, § 6, 8, upon the property insured, and the same was rendered liable to be sold therefor, not only in the hands of the subscriber, his representatives and assigns, but also when sold or mortgaged; and the purchaser or mortgagee was constituted a member in the room of the original owner. The clauses creating this lien, as indeed most of the legislation on the subject

709 of this corporation, *are extremely awkward; but there can be no doubt of the intent of the legislature to give a valid and effectual lien, not only against the original member, but against all persons deriving any ownership of the property from him. And this lien was held by this court, in the case of Mut. Ass. Soc. v. Stone &c., 3 Leigh 218, to attach to and follow the property in the hands of a subsequent bona fide purchaser without notice of the lien or of the insurance.

The additional premium is for the increase of value or hazard shewn by a revaluation, whether the periodical revaluation directed by law and the regulations of the society, or made at any other time, at the instance either of the society or of the insured member. The revaluation does not affect, nor is it requisite for, the validity of the original insurance; except so far as it serves to cure defects therein, or to increase or diminish the sum secured. In other respects the original insurance continues in full force, whether a revaluation be made or not. The member may concur in the revaluation, in which case he executes a declaration of revaluation; but it is not necessary that he should concur, nor that he should have any notice thereof. In case of the death, absence or refusal of a member, the special agent proceeds, with the appraisers, in the revaluation; and if that shews an increase of value, the former value still governs, unless otherwise directed by the owner. Act of Assembly of 1805, § 7, Constitution, Rules and Regulations, p. 19, 20, 21, 22, § 13, p. 22, § 14. The additional premium is a lien upon the property in like manner as the quotas. Mut. Ass. Soc. v. Stone &c., 3 Leigh 218.

In the present case, the property insured consisted of two tenements in the town of Fredericksburg, which were owned by Claiborne Wigglesworth, and at his death descended to his heirs. One of them was declared for insurance by Wigglesworth, and the other by Wright, a 710 *former proprietor; and both were several times revalued after Wigglesworth's death. These tenements were assigned to Wigglesworth's widow for her dower in his real estate: she afterwards intermarried with Waugh, and they sold and conveyed her life estate therein to Shirley the appellant. The claim of the Mutual Assurance Society is for quotas which accrued after Wigglesworth's death, some before the assignment of dower, others afterwards and before Shirley's purchase, and the rest since his purchase; and also for a small additional premium, which has accrued during Shirley's ownership.

It is contended for the appellant that the widow's right is paramount to the lien of the society; and if this be so, then it follows that the property cannot be subjected in his hands to the demand of the society; nor can he be made personally responsible, inasmuch as there can be no indebtedness on his part in the character of owner. This defence is founded upon the supposition of the fact that the insurances of the property were effected subsequently to the intermarriage of mr. and mrs. Wigglesworth. The fact is not asserted in Shirley's answer, nor does it appear from any part of the record. I deem it, however, wholly immaterial, as I consider the lien of the society equally valid in either aspect of the case.

It is true that a widow is dowable of all the lands of which her husband was seized at any time during the coverture, and that his alienations and incumbrances are not good against her, unless she has united therein, and relinquished her right, on privy examination, in the manner prescribed by law. But the lien in question is not derived merely from the contract of the husband. It is established by the authority of the legislature, the competency of which cannot be questioned; and the extent of the lien depends upon the true construction of the statute. It is therefore a matter 711 of *judicial interpretation whether the legislature intended that the lien on the property insured, given in the most comprehensive terms, should be subordinate to the inchoate and contingent dower interest of the wife. To hold the affirmative would be to uproot the whole institution. The effect of the widow's holding her dower discharged of its liability for contributions must inevitably be to abrogate the insurance. During her life estate, the assessments upon the property would be utterly nugatory, as they could not be enforced either against the subject or the owner; nor could there be any liability for previous arrears. In this state of things, there could be no responsibility of the society for destruction by fire: and the insurance, thus defeated during the tenancy for life, would be destroyed altogether; for the contract was to insure the whole fee simple, and not merely the remainder or reversion. If such had been the understanding of the law, the institution could never have had existence, or must have perished in its infancy, by reason of the inherent vice in its constitution, for which there is no remedy, inasmuch as the feme covert could not, if she would, relinquish her dower interest. This result would have been inevitable, unless insurances had been confined to spinsters and widows, bachelors and widowers: the insurances of married men would have been practically prohibited.

A construction so unreasonable and mischievous is impossible. Nothing could be more pernicious to the interests of the feme, or more repugnant to the principles of dower rights. The alienation of the husband by conveyance or mortgage is inoperative at his death as regards the wife, because otherwise the property would be converted, and the proceeds might be wasted. But a pledge by insurance is for the benefit of the feme, and tends not to the destruction but to the preservation of her estate; and to authorize it was a wise and benevolent exercise of legislative power.

712 *The widow, therefore, took her dower interest subject to the lien of the society; but she incurred no personal responsibility until the assignment of her dower, whereby she became a member, and then only for the contributions accruing during her ownership. That every owner of a present freehold estate in insured property becomes a member, according to the true spirit of the law, and the scheme of the institution, I cannot doubt, whatever difficulty might be presented by the mere letter of the statute. As to those contributions which accrued during Wigglesworth's life, and for which, if still in arrear, the assets of his estate would be liable since his death, they seem to have been paid, and to form no part of the present demand: for those which accrued afterwards and before the assignment of dower, his heirs are personally responsible; for till then they succeeded to the membership of their ancestor, and it was their duty to assign the widow her dower. The widow and her second husband are personally liable for the contributions which accrued after the assignment of dower and before their sale to the appellant: and for those which have accrued since, the appellant is personally responsible, but for those only. If a regulation of the society (Constitution, Rules and Regulations, p. 16, 17, § 4), is to be understood as intended to make a purchaser or mortgagee personally liable for arrears prior to his title, it transcends the powers of the corporation, which has no authority except over its own members; and it is not until they acquire their title that such persons become members, and then only as regards their own rights and responsibilities.

The decree of the circuit court is consequently erroneous in subjecting the appellant personally to the whole arrears of contributions, with the interest and damages thereon. A personal decree against him for so much of the demand as has accrued 713 during his *ownership would not have been improper, but would have given only partial relief to the society. The plaintiffs are entitled to a lien upon the property for the whole principal and interest of their claim, but not for the damages. The damages, it is true, are not to be regarded as a penalty, being nothing more than a reasonable allowance, under the regulations of the society, for the expenses and trouble of collection. It is therefore quite proper that these liquidated damages should be embraced in a personal judgment or decree. But no lien therefor is given by the statute; and the effect of treating them as an incidental lien would often be to make one person liable for them in consequence not of his own default, but of the default of another.

When we next consider what decree ought to have been rendered, it appears to me that the lien of the society is to be treated as an entire thing; and not, as suggested by the appellant's counsel, to be broken into parts, and carried out separately against the estate for life and that in reversion. Such a mode of enforcing an incumbrance would, I think, be unprecedented, and inevitably tend to the sacrifice of the property, and the diminution of the security. There can be no objection, I admit, to ascertaining the several personal responsibilities; and that ought to be done, at the most convenient stage of the cause, with the view of adjusting the equities amongst the defendants arising out of the proper relief to the plaintiffs, and, it may be, to the more perfect relief of the plaintiffs themselves. But in the adjustment of those equities, the appellant will not be entitled, as his counsel supposes, to an apportionment of the quotas between the estate for life and that in reversion.

No part of the quotas which have accrued since the assignment of dower, is, in my opinion, chargeable upon the reversion in ease of the life estate. The argument for the appellant is, that the quotas are 714 for the *insurance of the whole fee simple, and inasmuch as that operates, in the event of loss, to the remuneration of the reversioner as well as of the tenant for life, it is but reasonable that the former should bear a due proportion of the burthen enuring to their benefit. There is much plausibility in this reasoning; but it keeps out of view the important consideration that the quotas, though a lien upon the capital, are a charge upon the profits. They detract by their amount from the income of the estate, but do not break in upon the principal; and the tenant for life, while enjoying the profits, ought to keep down such annual or occasional charges; as the reversioners will have to do when, upon the falling in of the life estate, they come to the perception of the profits. The tenant for life is directly responsible to the society for the quotas, and subject to an action at law for the recovery thereof: but it is otherwise as regards the reversioners, who cannot be called upon at all personally during the continuance of the life estate. And what reason can be given for this, other than the fact that the tenant for life is in the perception of the profits, and consequently alone responsible for the charges upon them? and what better right can there be to call upon the reversioner for contribution in regard to quotas, than in regard to taxes, or a ground rent, or a rent charge? The tenant for life, moreover, not only enjoys the profits, but also any income accruing from the insurance itself; for the dividend of any surplus interest arising from the capital funds of the society, directed by the act of 1803, § 12, would surely be payable to the tenant for life, and not to the reversioner or remainderman.

We must bear in mind that the assessment of quotas arises out of an insurance effected by the owner of the whole fee, to the enjoyment of whose estate in the property the tenant for life and the reversioners succeed successively. It is 715 upon these facts alone that the *claim to apportionment is founded, under the influence of the maxim of equity that he who shares the benefit must share the burthen. But here the reversioner shares no benefit, so far as the profits are concerned, during the continuance of the life estate, though the property should be destroyed by fire; for in that event the effect of the insurance is to convert the estate from land into money, and to give the interest in lieu of profits to the tenant for life, and the principal, upon the falling in of the life estate, to the reversioner. And if there is a common benefit to the tenant for life, and the reversioner in securing the capital which yields the profits, it ought to be paid for out of those profits progressively, and in the same succession, with the original hazard. Nor is the claim of tenant for life against reversioner, for contribution on account of quotas during the life estate, stronger than would be that of reversioner against the estate of tenant for life, for quotas accruing during the reversion; for the insurance was of the whole estate, and the quotas are the consideration for the entire insurance.

The supposed analogy of fines for the renewal of leases throws no light upon the present question: for the renewal is in the nature of a new purchase, of which the fine is the consideration, and in cases to which the doctrine is applicable the tenants are treated as joint purchasers of successive interests; and that of course calls for an apportionment of the price according to the value of their respective interests, as much so as if the transaction were an original purchase. A joint declaration for insurance made by successive tenants would bear some resemblance to such renewal of leases: but here the insurance is a mere incumbrance, descending with the estate from the owner of the fee by whom it was created. The most obvious and striking analogy is that of a mortgage; and there 716 *the tenant for life is obliged to keep down the interest of the debt, and in case of redemption to contribute beyond the interest for whatever benefit he derives from the liquidation of the debt. 1 Story's Eq. 465. Of course if the reversioner or remainderman pays the interest to prevent a foreclosure, the tenant for life is bound to refund; and so it would be in regard to payment of insurance quotas made to prevent a sale under the lien. The certain benefit to the reversioner in the case of a mortgage, or his contingent benefit in the case of an insurance, arising from the payment of the interest in the former or of the quotas in the latter, does not relieve in any degree the tenant for life from the duty, imposed by his enjoyment of the profits, of keeping down the annual or occasional charges. And what, at most, is the substantial effect of the insurance, but a reparation of the property, made or paid for, if you please, by the tenant for life? and who ever heard of the costs of reparations by the tenant for life, whether partial or total, voluntary or compulsory, being thrown in any degree upon the remainderman or reversioner, however beneficial to him?

A claim like the present on the part of a dowress, or other person acquiring her title, has less colour of reason than that of any other tenant for life; for the assignment to her of one third of the real estate for dower is based upon an estimate of the annual profits, which involves an allowance for charges thereupon; and so another contribution from the heirs on account of those charges would yield her a double compensation.

Upon the whole, my opinion is that the decree of the circuit court ought to be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, according to the principles above indicated, and such further directions as shall be given by the decree of this court.

717 *STANARD, J. I have grave doubts on several of the points embraced by the opinion just delivered by my brother Baldwin. But as the residue of my brethren have no hesitation in concurring in that opinion and the proposed decree of the court, so that whatever the result of any farther investigation on my part might be, the result of the decision would remain unaffected, I have not thought it proper to ask that the decision should be delayed for the purpose of enabling me to make up an opinion.

BROOKE and ALLEN, J., concurred in the opinion of Baldwin, J.

The decree of the court of appeals was entered in the following terms:

The court is of opinion that the decree of the circuit court is erroneous in charging the appellant personally with the whole amount of the appellees' demand; the appellant being liable personally only for the quotas and additional premium which accrued during his ownership of the property, with the interest and damages thereon: that the heirs of Claiborne Wigglesworth deceased are personally liable for the quotas which accrued after his death and before the assignment of dower to his widow, with the interest and damages thereon: and that the widow and her second husband Waugh are personally liable for the quotas which accrued after the assignment of dower and before their sale to the appellant, with the interest and damages thereon. The court is further of opinion that the appellees have a lien upon the tenements in the proceedings mentioned respectively, for the principal money and interest respectively due for the insurance thereof, but not for the damages; which lien is to be enforced, if necessary, against said tenements respectively, by sales of the 718 whole fee simple title thereof, and of the *whole of each tenement, unless from the nature of the property it be practicable and expedient to lay off portions thereof for such sales respectively. The court is further of opinion that such sales, under the circumstances of the case, ought to be upon credit, except for the charges of sale, which ought to be required in cash: that the amount due to the appellees of principal money and interest, at the times of the sales respectively, ought to constitute the first deferred instalment (which ought to bear interest) and the residue of the purchase money the remaining instalments; the credit for the deferred instalments to be liberal, and the purchase money well secured. The court is further of opinion, that before directing such sales, the respective personal liabilities of the defendants for principal money, interest and damages ought to be ascertained; and that if the appellant, or any other person, should advance the amount chargeable to the heirs of Wigglesworth, and the personal responsibility of the appellant, and the life estate in the property, should be sufficient to insure payment of the residue due the appellees, then there should be no sale of the reversion, but a lien thereon established for reimbursement of the amount so advanced, with interest thereon; but such lien not to be enforced until the falling in of the life estate. The court is further of opinion, that in the event of such sales, the deferred instalments, except the first, ought to be divided between the appellant and the heirs of Wigglesworth, according to the value of their respective interests in the property; and that the respective shares ought to be subjected to the respective equities of the defendants amongst themselves. And the court is further of opinion, that if such sales should be necessary, and it shall appear that the common interest of the appellant and the heirs of Wigglesworth will be promoted by the sale of only one of said tenements, and the application of the proceeds as aforesaid, 719 in exoneration *of the other, that course of proceeding ought to be adopted, if the relief of the appellees will not be impaired, nor the rights of others injuriously affected thereby. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the said decree of the circuit court be reversed with costs, and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to the principles above declared.

Thornton v. Gordon & C.

(Absent BROOKS and STANARD,* J.)

Answer—Weight as Evidence—Rule.†—It is a rule in equity that the answer of a defendant denying the allegations of the bill must be taken as true unless disproved by two witnesses, or by one witness and circumstances in his support: it is not in the power of a plaintiff to make his case an exception to this rule by stating in his bill that he expects to prove its allegations, and disclaiming a discovery from the defendant.

*He had been counsel for the appellee.

†Answer—Weight as Evidence.—Though a plaintiff in his bill may disclaim the benefit of a discovery, he cannot thereby deprive the defendant of the right to answer on oath, and have the advantage of such answer as evidence in his favor so far as it is responsive to the bill. For this proposition the principal case is cited in Jones v. Abraham, 75 Va. 469; Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 206. The principal case is cited in this connection in Davis v. Demming, 12 W. Va. 276; Powell v. Manson, 22 Gratt. 190; Wise v.

Same—Same—Usury—Discovery Disclaimed;—Case at Bar.—A bill is filed to injoin the sale of property conveyed to secure a debt alleged to be usurious, and the plaintiff avers that he expects to make full proof of his allegations, and disclaims all benefit of any discovery from the defendant. The injunction is awarded. But afterwards the defendant files an answer denying the allegations of the bill. And the plaintiff relies on the testimony of a single witness, unsustained by any corroborating circumstances. HELD, the injunction must be dissolved and the bill dismissed.

On the 29th of March 1823, George W. S. Thornton executed an obligation to Bazil Gordon for the payment of 3000 dollars on the first of January 1828, with interest from the date, to be paid on the first of January 1824, and annually thereafter. At the 720 time of giving *this obligation, Thornton also executed a deed of trust to James W. Ford, conveying a tract of land in trust, with power to sell the same if default should be made in the payment.

Thornton having died, leaving Jane W. A. Thornton an infant and only child his devisee, she, by her next friend, filed a bill in the superior court of chancery at Fredericksburg, in March 1831, against Gordon and Ford, alleging that the transaction was usurious. The bill, after setting forth the facts relied on to establish the usury, averred that the complainant expected to be able to make full proof of her allegations, Same—Same.—The principal case is cited in Latham v. Latham, 30 Gratt. 313, for the proposition that the defendant, in every case, may respond in his answer to the charges in the bill; and he is entitled to the benefit of it. It is the law of the forum and all who apply to it for relief must submit to have their causes tried according to the established mode of procedure. See the principal case cited in Powell v. Manson, 22 Gratt. 190.

‡Same—Same—Usury—Discovery Disclaimed.—In Davis v. Demming, 12 W. Va. 269, the court, in the course of its discussion of the case of Marks v. Morris, 4 Hen. & Munf. 463, s. c. 2 Munf. 407, said: "In Thornton v. Gordon, 2 Rob. 719, the court unanimously decided, that upon a state of facts similar to those in Marks v. Morris, and on a bill framed in like manner, though plaintiff alleges that he expects to make full proof of his allegations of usury and expressly disclaims a discovery from the defendant, the defendant has nevertheless a right to file an answer denying the allegation of usury; and if he files such answer, it is entitled to the full weight of an answer in any other case; and if the usury is proved by one witness only, the injunction awarded must be dissolved and the bill dismissed."

In Davis v. Demming, 12 W. Va. 274, it was said: "In Thornton v. Gordon, 2 Rob. 719, decided in 1849, the court, while not disapproving the case of Marks v. Morris, decided a principle apparently not altogether consistent with that case." See monographic note on "Usury" appended to Coffman & Bruffy v. Miller, 26 Gratt. 698.

and disclaimed all benefit of any discovery from the defendants. It prayed, however, that the defendants might answer the premises, and that they might be restrained from proceeding on the deed of trust until its validity should be ascertained by a trial at law, and also for such other and further relief as to the court might seem reasonable. The injunction was awarded.

The defendants both filed answers under oath. That of Ford contained nothing material. In Gordon's, all the facts relied on as constituting the transaction usurious were clearly, positively, and explicitly denied.

On the part of the plaintiff it was attempted to be established, that though the obligation from Thornton to Gordon was for bank stock transferred to the former by the latter, the transaction was really a loan of money, and the particular form of a sale of stock merely adopted as a shift or device to evade the statute against usury. There was, however, but a single witness whose testimony tended to make out the plaintiff's case.

The circuit court of Spotsylvania, to which the case was by law transferred, made a decree, on the 30th of June 1832, dissolving the injunction and dismissing the bill with costs.

From that decree the plaintiff appealed to this court.

721 *The cause was elaborately argued by Harrison and C. Johnson for the appellant, and by Stanard, Patton and Leigh for the appellee, upon the question whether the facts deposed to constituted usury: but the notice of the argument will be confined to a point which was made after Harrison had opened the case, and was discussed between Johnson and the counsel for the appellee; the decision of the court being upon this alone.

Johnson. The answer of the defendant is entitled to no more weight than a plea of a defendant at law,—the plea of not guilty to an indictment, or any other plea which merely puts in issue the matter of charge. The denial of the answer merely counter-veils the allegation of the bill, and leaves the question of usury in equilibrio. Where the plaintiff calls for the testimony of his adversary upon oath, his answer is made evidence by this exercise of a right on the part of the plaintiff: otherwise where the plaintiff demands no discovery, no answer upon oath. In the latter case the answer, though upon oath (which it need not be), is no evidence against the plaintiff. The defendant cannot become a witness in his own favour without the requisition and against the will of the plaintiff. In support of these principles, 2 Story's Equity, p. 743-5, § 1528, 1529, and Taylor v. Moore, 2 Rand. 575, are relied on. The bill here not being filed under the third section of our statute, a call for a discovery might have been demurred to. As to any admissions in the answer, they may be used against the defendant precisely as any other confessions of a party may be used against him, wherever or however made.

Stanard. Upon examination of the case of Marks v. Morris, 2 Munf. 407, the cases reviewed in Martin v. Lindsay's adm'r and others, 1 Leigh 499, and the subsequent cases of Fitzhugh v. Gordon, 2 Leigh 626, and Turpin v. Povall &c., 8 Leigh 93, it will be found that the extent to which the decisions in Virginia have gone 722 *is only this,—that although the bill calls for a discovery and the defendant admits the usury, such admission, where the plaintiff can prove the usury otherwise, shall not deprive him of the opportunity of pleading and proving the usury at law. There is no case deciding that equity may interfere on the sole testimony of one witness, where the usury is denied by the answer. Gilliam v. Clay and others, 3 Leigh 590, certainly does not sustain any such proposition; it may, however, be invoked against it.

Patton. Suppose a plaintiff goes into equity disclaiming all benefit of discovery from the defendant's answer, and alleging that he is fullhanded with proof; he fails to produce such proof, but the defendant admits the usury: in such a state of facts, would the court send the question of usury to be tried at law, though admitted by the defendant? or would it take the admission as proof of the usury, and give relief? Surely it would not do so idle a thing as to require the parties to litigate a question which had been settled by the admission of the defendant in his answer; nor so inequitable a thing as to send the parties to a court of law, when the consequence must be the forfeiture of the whole debt, upon proof of the usury by the defendant's admission in the court of chancery. The usury in such a case would be taken as proved, and relief given as provided for in the third section. Why, then, if the defendant denies the usury, shall his answer not be evidence for him? According to Mr. Johnson's view, though the bill here calls upon the defendant to answer all the allegations thereof, that is no call for a discovery—for an answer upon oath; it is merely a call on him to answer as in case of a legal demand he would be called on to answer the declaration; that is, by pleading to the action,—by putting in issue the plaintiff's claim, if he designs to contest it. This is a novel idea, wholly unwarranted by the principles of equity proceedings, or by author-723 ity. It is the *defendant's privilege to answer, as well as the plaintiff's privilege to call upon him to do so; the defendant's right to have his answer weighed as evidence when it makes for him, as well as the plaintiff's right to avail himself of admissions made by the answer; the defendant's right to require that his denial of a fact alleged in the bill shall in all cases be equivalent to the testimony of two witnesses, or one witness and pregnant circumstances. By resorting to the court of chancery, by filing his bill, the plaintiff submits himself to encounter the weight of the defendant's answer; and his disclaimer of benefit from it, his assertion that he is provided with proof aliunde, cannot amount to a retraction of that submission, and deprive the defendant of his rights in the forum of equity.

Leigh. The proposition of Mr. Johnson is wholly new; not to be found decided, or even expressly stated, in any case whatever. If the proposition be correct, the plaintiff in equity may in every case, by disclaiming any discovery from the defendant, entitle himself to equitable relief upon the testimony of a single witness, as well where such relief is to produce a forfeiture or the infliction of a penalty, as in any other case. If it be correct, it must go the length of changing the whole course of chancery proceeding, and the fundamental principles of chancery pleading and evidence, at least as they have been hitherto commonly and almost universally understood.

Johnson in reply. It is the privilege of a plaintiff to resort to the conscience of the defendant, or not to resort to it, as he pleases. If a defendant has a right to answer, and have his answer weighed as evidence, why does not this right extend to all matters pertinent to the issue, instead of being restricted, as it confessedly is, to those matters as to which his answer is specifically called for? In general, an answer upon oath is called for as to all the matters distinctly alleged by the bill, 724 *because generally the plaintiff expects some benefit from the answer of the defendant, some saving of trouble at least, as to all his allegations. And this is the reason, and a sufficient reason, why the elementary writers speak only of the weight of the answer in general. It is, in general, called for, and the defendant made a witness by the plaintiff as to the whole of the matters charged in the bill. The precise proposition now contended for, it is admitted, is not expressly stated, nor the question directly considered, in any of the elementary works. But the principle is a legitimate consequence from the case of Marks v. Morris, and is supported by the opinions of judges Coalter and Roane in M'Pherrin & c. v. King & c., 1 Rand. 172. The case of Kincheloe v. Kincheloe, 11 Leigh 393, is strongly analogous to this, and the opinions there as to the weight of the answer are applicable here. [Patton. The ground of that decision appears in the late case of Malone's adm'r and others v. Hobbs and others, 1 Rob. 346, in which it was held that it is sufficient to aver in general terms that a writing admitted to probat is not the will of the decedent, and that without any proof of the averment the court is bound to direct an issue.] There was no question in Malone & c. v. Hobbs & c. as to the weight of the answer. It is not contended that the plaintiff here is entitled to the interposition of the court to give him a trial at law, without proof of his case, upon a mere suggestion of usury; but that he is entitled to have the testimony of his witnesses weighed without prejudice from the defendant's answer.

ALLEN, J. As the witness relied on by the plaintiff stands alone, unsustained by any corroborating circumstance in the case, the question arises, to what weight is the answer in such circumstances entitled? In Alam v. Jourdan, 1 Vernon 161, one of the earliest cases, the rule which has always been recognized since is laid 725 *down, that where there is but one witness against the answer, the plaintiff cannot have a decree. In Pember v. Mathers, 1 Bro. Ch. R. 52, it is said, that where the defendant in express terms negatives the allegations of the bill, and the evidence is only of one person, there the court will neither make a decree nor send the case to a trial at law. In 2 Madd. Ch. Pract. 443, the rule is stated in these words: "If the defendant positively, plainly and precisely denies an assertion in the bill, and one witness only proves it as positively, clearly and precisely as it is denied, no decree for relief can be made." But it has been argued, that the rule giving to the answer the weight of evidence arises from the right of the plaintiff to call for a discovery; that this is the privilege of the plaintiff, and he may waive it: and a passage in Story's Equity (vol. 2, p. 744,) is relied on to sustain this proposition. The reason on which the rule stands is there stated to be this: "The plaintiff calls upon the defendant to answer an allegation of fact which he makes; and thereby he admits the answer to be evidence of that fact." If this were the sole foundation of the rule, it would seem to follow that if, by calling upon the defendant to answer, the answer when made is admitted to be evidence of the fact, the plaintiff would be concluded by it.

Perhaps the origin of the rule is to be found in the civil law, which required the evidence of two witnesses as the foundation of a decree. Judge Story, in page 745, refers to the rule of the civil law, and observes, that "these coincidences between the civil law and equity jurisprudence, if they do not demonstrate a common origin of the doctrines on this subject, serve at least to shew that they have a firm foundation in natural justice." To whatever source the rule is traced, it is firmly established as one of the fundamental principles of a court of equity. It is the law of the forum, and all who apply to it for 726 relief must submit to have *their causes tried according to its established modes of procedure. It would be as competent for this court to remodel the whole doctrine of a court of equity in regard to pleadings and evidence, as to declare that in this particular case the defendant should be deprived of the benefit of his answer. The cases do not confine this privilege to answers to bills seeking a discovery. In truth the rule has no application to a mere technical bill of discovery, where no relief is prayed, but the discovery is required to be used in some trial at law; for there the plaintiff has his election to use the answer or not. The principle becomes of importance in those cases alone where an issue of fact is to be tried by the court. There are many cases, as of fraud, accident, and the like, where in truth the plaintiff may require no disclosure to make out his case, but equity alone has jurisdiction over the subject. In all such cases, according to the proposition now contended for, he may deprive the defendant of the advantage of his answer, by disclaiming the benefit of a discovery. Judge Story, in the same section to which reference has been made, states the rule, in conformity with the authorities before cited, in these words: "It is an invariable rule in equity, that where the defendant in express terms negatives the allegations of the bill, and the evidence is only of one person, affirming as a witness what has been so negatived, the court will neither make a decree nor send the case to be tried at law, but will simply dismiss the bill." The bill must disclose the plaintiff's case. The defendant, by the law of the court, may respond to these charges in his answer, and is entitled to the benefit of it. In the language of the lord chancellor in Pember v. Mathers, and of the rule as precisely laid down by the elementary writers, and by judge Story in the foregoing passage, where the defendant negatives the allegations of the bill, and the evidence is only of one person, the court will not make a 727 *decree, nor send the case to a trial at law. The right to negative the allegations of the bill by his answer is his privilege, resulting from his position as defendant called on to answer and make up an issue, and the plaintiff cannot, by waiving a discovery, deprive him of it.

The case of Marks v. Morris, 2 Munf. 407, and the subsequent cases upon the same question, have decided nothing as to this point. The proposition now under consideration was not discussed or considered in any of them. But the case of Gilliam v. Clay & others, 3 Leigh 590, does in effect establish a principle which is decisive of this matter, if the general rule is what I have supposed it to be. That was a bill exhibited by the obligor against the assignee of a bond and his trustees, to enjoin a sale under the trust deed, and praying for general relief, on the ground of usury. The deposition of the obligee and assignor of the bond was taken, to prove the usury between the obligor and assignee, as alleged in the bill. It was argued that an injunction might have been awarded only to stay the sale of the trust subject until the question of usury should be tried at law, and that the assignor could have no interest that a decree to that effect should be rendered for the obligor. The witness was held to be incompetent. Judge Carr, in delivering his opinion, in which the other judges concurred, remarked, that it made no difference as to the competency of the witness, whether it was a bill for final relief or not: that it would be carrying the principle of Marks v. Morris to a fearful extent, if the usury was to be proved in that transaction by evidence which would not be heard on a bill for relief: that before a court of equity should enjoin the trustee, and send the assignee to sue at law on his bond, for the express purpose of enabling the obligor to establish usury and thereby get clear of the whole debt, it should be well satisfied that usury had 728 *been practised; and that such conviction must be wrought by competent, disinterested testimony. This case, then, decides that the usury must be proved. The principle of Marks v. Morris was not permitted to control the rules of law as to the competency of the testimony, or to dispense with the necessity of proof. Proof being necessary, it can be offered but in the accustomed mode, upon an issue made up according to the forms of the court; and the weight of the testimony must be determined according to the rules applicable to other cases.

I think, therefore, that in this case, as there is but one witness against the answer, the decree dismissing the bill on that ground must be affirmed.

This renders it unnecessary to consider the other questions so elaborately argued. But for myself I may add, that the testimony does not, in my opinion, make out the usury; and that the case is not as strong as that of Selby v. Morgan, 3 Leigh 577, in which it was held that a transfer of bank stock, under the circumstances there detailed, was a fair sale, and not a device to cover a usurious loan of money.

BALDWIN, J., concurred.

CABELL, P., concurred in the opinion so far as relates to the necessity of two witnesses to disprove the answer; and also concurred in affirming the decree.

Decree affirmed.

Equity Practice—Removal of Slave from State Pending Injunction—Contempt—Relief of Reversion.†—

Upon a bill in equity by a reversioner of slaves against the husband of tenant for life, alleging a purpose to remove one of the slaves out of the commonwealth, an injunction is awarded, and bond given by the husband with surety, conditioned to abide by and perform the final decree of the court. Upon an amended bill against the surety as well as the husband, it appears that the surety, while bound as such, and of course with full knowledge of the plaintiff's claim, caused the slave to be removed and sold out of the commonwealth, through the instrumentality of an agent. HOLD. 1. That for such removal and sale in contempt and subversion of the court's authority, it is competent for the court to give redress and vindicate its jurisdiction by decreeing in favour of the plaintiff against both the obligors in the bond. 2. That the measure of relief is not for the value of the slave, but for the value of the plaintiff's reversionary estate in her, which should be ascertained by reference to a commissioner. 3. That the agent of the surety, by his agency in the removal and sale of the slave, would have subjected himself to the like decree, if he had known at the time of the claim of the plaintiff, and had confederated with the surety to defeat the same.

Same—Interrogatories.—Case in which a defendant was brought in by a messenger to answer interrogatories.

Benjamin Davis of Campbell county died intestate leaving no children, whereby his widow became entitled to one half of his personal estate, including the use for her life of two slaves named Billy and Esther, who were in her share. The widow removed to the state of Tennessee and married John W. Evans.

In 1821, William Davis senior the father of Benjamin, and the reversioner in the two slaves, exhibited a bill in equity to the superior court of chancery at Lynchburg against Evans, setting forth that the slaves had till *then remained in Campbell county, but that Evans had come to Virginia for the purpose of removing them out of the commonwealth. An injunction was prayed to restrain their removal, which the court awarded.

An amended bill was filed, setting forth, that before the process was served upon Evans, he actually removed the slaves out of the commonwealth. It alleged that there were moneys or affects in the hands of Thomas Fox as administrator of Benjamin Davis, to which Evans in right of his wife would be entitled, the amount whereof would depend upon a suit in which Fox as administrator of Davis was plaintiff and Jesse Harvey was defendant. Fox and Harvey were made defendants as well as Evans, and an injunction asked to restrain Fox and Harvey from secreting or paying over the said moneys or effects. The bill also prayed that Evans, who it was insisted had forfeited his and his wife's interest in the slaves by removing them from the commonwealth, might surrender the slaves, or that the plaintiff might receive from Harvey and Fox the value of them.

A restraining order was made, in May 1822, according to the prayer of this amended bill. After which Evans brought the slaves back into the commonwealth, and the plaintiff thereupon went into the office of the court of chancery and consented that the said order should be discharged, so as to permit Evans to collect from Fox and Harvey whatever he should be entitled to from them.

In May 1823, a second amended bill was filed, alleging that it was the intention of Evans to remove the slaves out of the commonwealth, or sell them to some person for the purpose of being removed, and praying that the injunction might be reinstated until Evans should give bond and security that he would not remove them. The injunction was reinstated accordingly; and thereupon, to wit, on the 13th of June 731 *1823, Evans gave bond with Cornelius Turner his surety, in the penalty of 2000 dollars, conditioned that he would abide by and perform the final decree of the court of chancery in the cause.

In November 1826, a third amended bill was filed against Turner, alleging, that after the bond was given, Evans left Esther with Turner, who was his brother in law, and that she had been carried out of the commonwealth and sold by Turner or his agents.

A fourth amended bill was filed, making defendant thereto William Helm, who had in possession the slave Billy and other effects of Evans.

Evans answered, that he sold Esther to Turner, and in the sale sacrificed her value by binding Turner to continue her in the state.

Turner, though served with a subpoena as early as the 17th of March 1827, not having filed any answer, the circuit court of Lynchburg (to which the case was by law transferred) made an order, on the 11th of January 1833, that he should be brought in by Hill Shaw, a messenger for that purpose, on the wednesday following, to answer interrogatories. Turner was accordingly brought in, and by his answers to the interrogatories it appeared, that he placed Esther in the hands of Daniel Johns of Pittsylvania to sell, and he afterwards understood from Johns that she had been sold by him for 250 dollars; but whether she was in or out of the commonwealth, he (Turner) did not know.

Thereupon, to wit, in February 1833, a fifth amended bill was filed, alleging that Johns, with a perfect knowledge of the plaintiff's right and of the pendency of this suit, carried Esther out of the commonwealth and sold her; charging a combination between Evans, Turner and Johns to deprive the plaintiff of his reversionary estate; insisting that the act of carrying the slave out of the commonwealth was a forfeiture of the life estate, and that he was entitled to receive from any or all of those participating in the act the full value of the slave.

732 *Johns, by his answer, admitted that he sold Esther as agent of Turner, but denied that he had confederated with Turner to defeat the plaintiff's claim, and indeed denied that he had any knowledge of the claim.

He did not admit that the slave was removed and sold out of the commonwealth: but in the opinion both of the circuit court and of this court, the fact was clearly established by the evidence. The circuit court was also satisfied from the evidence, that Johns confederated with Turner with full knowledge of the situation and title of the slave.

The cause having been revived in the name of the executor of Davis against the administrator of Evans, the circuit court, on the 4th of February 1835, decreed that Turner and Johns out of their own proper goods, and the administrator of Evans out of the goods of his intestate in his hands, should pay to the plaintiff the sum of 300 dollars, the value (in the opinion of the court) of Esther, with interest from the 16th of June 1826 (the time when she was sold by Johns) and the costs. But the plaintiff was not to have execution of the decree against Evans's administrator unless it should be ascertained that the money could not be made out of the other defendants. In case he should be subjected to payment, leave was given him to apply for a decree over. And liberty was reserved to Johns, in case the money should be made of him, to apply for a decree over against Turner.

On the petition of Johns an appeal was allowed.

733 *Stanard for appellant. As a general rule, a bill in equity will not lie for a reversioner or remainderman to recover from the tenant for life a slave or the value, upon the ground of a forfeiture having been incurred under the statute. The penalty is severe, and it would be contrary to a fundamental principle of equity to aid in its recovery when the party has a remedy at law. Livingston v. Tompkins, 4 Johns. Ch. Rep. 431. The case cannot be different here, merely because the plaintiff had applied before to the conservative power of the court to secure the property to him when his right of enjoyment should accrue.

But the decree goes beyond the statute. That, while it forfeits the husband's life

The statutes of Virginia bearing upon the case are in 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 111, § 48, 49, p. 431, 2. They are as follows:

§ 48. "If any person or persons possessed of a life estate in any slave or slaves shall remove, or voluntarily permit to be removed, out of this commonwealth, such slave or slaves, or any of their increase, without the consent of him or her in reversion or remainder, such person or persons shall forfeit every such slave or slaves so removed, and the full value thereof, unto the person or persons that shall have the reversion or remainder thereof; any law, custom or usage to the contrary notwithstanding."—Note in Original Edition.

§ 49. "If any female possessed as aforesaid shall be married to a husband who shall remove, or voluntarily permit to be removed, out of this commonwealth, any such slave or slaves, or any of their increase, without the consent of him or her in reversion or remainder, in such case it shall be lawful for him or her in reversion or remainder to sue for, recover and possess such slave or slaves so removed, for and during the life of the said husband; who shall moreover be liable to the action of the person or persons entitled to the reversion or remainder thereof, for the full value of the slave or slaves so removed."—Note in Original Edition.

estate for his wrongful act, does not affect the interest of the wife, who has committed no wrong. At all events, the liability created by the statute is only of the husband or the tenant for life. When a third person is liable for aiding in the eloignement of a slave, that liability does not result from the statute; it is not independent of the actual damage, but is strictly measured by such damage, and cannot be carried beyond it.

C. Johnson for appellees. Turner, if Johns had not intromitted at all, would have been liable to the decree which was rendered. And if so, how can Johns stand in a better situation? He acted in combination with Turner, and under his direction; he acted pendente lite; he acted, as we contend, with full and actual knowledge of the pendency of this suit, and of Davis's rights in the property.

The court of chancery, having properly taken jurisdiction for the purpose of protecting the plaintiff's rights in remainder, as properly proceeded to decree indemnity for the violation of those rights, perpetrated while the suit was pending, and in defiance of the restraining orders of the court. It is immaterial that the conduct of the defendants produced a forfeiture of the life estate, and an immediate right of possession on the part of the plaintiff. The jurisdiction originally vested in the court was never afterwards divested. And when the court was satisfied that the slave was irretrievably gone, it properly proceeded, having all the parties and all the facts before it, to do complete justice and put an end to the controversy, without imposing on the injured party the burthen of a new litigation at law.

735 *Stanard. There is no evidence to prove any such knowledge or confederacy on the part of Johns as the circuit court and the counsel on the other side have supposed.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the following as the opinion of the court:

The court, without considering whether it is competent for a court of equity to enforce the forfeiture of the life estate in slaves, incurred by the tenant for life's removal of the slaves beyond the limits of the commonwealth, to the prejudice of the right of the remainderman or reversioner, is of opinion that the claim to such forfeiture on the part of Davis, the appellee's testator, asserted in his first amended bill in regard to the slaves in the proceedings mentioned, removed from the commonwealth by Evans the intestate of the appellee Fox, was waived, after said Evans had brought back said slaves, by the consent of said Davis to discharge the restraining order of May 1822 against the effects of said Evans, and his proceeding afterwards by his second amended bill, and the injunction and restraining order of May 1823 obtained thereupon, to prevent the said Evans from again removing the said slaves out of the commonwealth. And the court is further of opinion that the effect of the injunction against the removal of the slaves, granted by the last mentioned order, and of the bond given by said Evans with the defendant Turner as his surety, under the provisions thereof, conditioned to have said slaves forthcoming to answer the decree of the court, would have been to secure to the said Davis the relief sought by his second amended bill, inasmuch as the court, upon the hearing of the cause, could have directed that said Evans should give bond and security conditioned against the removal of the slaves from the commonwealth, and in the event of his failure, that the slaves 736 should be kept within the *power and under the control of the court. And the court is further of opinion that the subsequent conduct of said Turner, after he had obtained possession of the slave Esther from said Evans, and while bound as his surety as aforesaid, and of course with a full knowledge of said Davis's claim, in causing said Esther to be removed and sold beyond the reach of the court, was in contempt and subversion of its authority, and that it was competent for the court to give the only redress within its power, and to vindicate its jurisdiction, by decreeing against said Turner, to the party injured, the value of the reversion in said slave Esther; and that said conduct of said Turner was moreover a breach of the condition of the bond executed as aforesaid by said Evans with said Turner as his surety, which subjected the said Evans also to the like decree. And the court is further of opinion that the appellant, by his agency in the removal and sale of said slave, would have subjected himself also to the like decree, if he had known at the time of the claim of said Davis, and had confederated with said Turner to defeat the same; but that such knowledge and confederacy have not been established by the evidence in the cause. The court is therefore of opinion that the said decree is erroneous in giving any relief against the appellant, and is moreover erroneous in the measure of relief given against said Turner and the administrator of said Evans, inasmuch as the same should have been not for the value of the slave Esther, but for the value of said Davis's reversionary estate in her, which ought to have been ascertained by reference to a commissioner. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the said decree of the circuit court be reversed with costs. And this court proceeding to render such decree in regard to the appellant as ought to have been rendered by the said circuit court, it is further ordered and decreed that the fifth 737 amended bill of the appellee be dismissed as to *the appellant, but without costs. And the cause is remanded to the said circuit court, to be there further proceeded in, as regards the other defendants, according to the principles above declared.

Commonwealth v. Farmers Bank.

(Absent CABELL, P.)

Banks—Deposits of Public Money—When Not Entitled to Credit with Commonwealth for Premium on Specie—Statutes.*—The banks of this commonwealth in which the public moneys were on deposit, paid the interest falling due in January 1840 upon public loans, in specie or its equivalent. Under the proviso to the second section of the act of March 28, 1838, (Sess. Acts of 1838, p. 27, ch. 13,) they claimed credit in account with the commonwealth for the premium which they had to pay to the public creditors for the then difference between specie and the notes of the banks. HELD. 1. That under the acts in 2 R. C. of 1819, ch. 174, § 6, p. 2, and in Sess. Acts of 1838, p. 27, ch. 14, the claim of any bank for such premium may properly be presented to the first auditor. 2. That, upon the disallowance of such claim, the bank may file a petition for redress to the court of chancery for Henrico and Richmond, created by the act of March 18, 1841, in Sess. Acts of 1840-41, p. 65, ch. 48. 3. That according to the true construction and effect of the act of December 11, 1839, in Sess. Acts of 1839-40, p. 52, ch. 63, (especially of the first proviso thereto) the claim of any bank for the premium so paid must be disallowed; dissentiente BROOKS, J., on the last point.

During a suspension of specie payments by the banks of this commonwealth, an act was passed the 28th of March 1838 to provide for the payment of the interest on the public debt in specie or its equivalent, which contained these provisions:

1. That the interest which shall hereafter accrue on the existing debts of the commonwealth for loans obtained, 738 *and on the debts which may be created for future loans, shall be paid in the current gold and silver coins of the United States, at their value as established by law, or in their equivalent, at the option of the holder.

2. That all warrants which shall be drawn upon the treasury in payment of the interest aforesaid, by the auditor of public accounts, or the second auditor, shall be discharged by the bank or banks at which such warrants shall be made payable by the checks of the treasurer, in the manner prescribed in the foregoing section: provided, that the said bank or banks shall be entitled to a credit in account with the commonwealth for whatever premium or discount the said bank or banks may be subjected to in making payment of the several warrants or checks as directed by this act.

Subsequent to this act the banks of this commonwealth resumed the payment of their debts in specie; but in October 1839 they again suspended; and on the 11th of December 1839 an act was passed for their temporary relief, which contained (amongst other things) a proviso in these words:

"Provided, that the banks of this commonwealth in which the public moneys are on deposit shall pay the interest falling due in January next upon public loans, in specie or its equivalent, if the public creditors require it, if there be so much in said banks to the credit of the commonwealth."

The Farmers bank of Virginia was one of the banks in which the public moneys were on deposit. And when warrants were drawn upon the treasury in payment of the interest due the public creditors in January 1840, some of those warrants were made payable at the Farmers bank by the checks of the treasurer, and were there discharged; there being therein to the credit of the commonwealth as much as the warrants so discharged. The Farmers bank 739 claimed that the payment *of these warrants or checks for interest falling due in January 1840 subjected it to a premium or discount of 4452 dollars 46 cents, and that it was entitled to a credit in account with the commonwealth for this premium or discount.

The claim was presented to the first auditor, and the same not being allowed, a petition was filed by the bank in the superior court of chancery for the Richmond circuit, under the acts in 2 R. C. of 1819, ch. 174, § 6, p. 2, and Sess. Acts of 1839, p. 27, ch. 14. The auditor filed an answer, insisting 1. that upon the merits the bank was not entitled to the amount claimed; and 2. that the claim was against the board of public works, because the premiums and discounts were paid by the bank upon the warrants of the second auditor, issued for interest on loans contracted for internal improvement.

The court of chancery,—being of opinion that the provision contained in the act of the 28th of March 1838, declaring that the banks should be entitled to credit for whatever premium or discount they might be subjected to, was in full force at the date of the payments in question, notwithstanding the proviso contained in the subsequent act of the 11th of December 1839,—reversed the decision of the auditor, and made a decree in favour of the bank against the commonwealth for the sum of 4452 dollars 46 cents, but without interest or costs.

From which decree an appeal was allowed on the petition of the auditor, wherein it was farther insisted that the petition of the bank ought to have been to the circuit court of Henrico on its law side, and not to the court of chancery; the claim being a common law claim, and not one of which equity has jurisdiction.

The cause was argued by Cooke for the commonwealth, and Macfarland for 740 the Farmers bank. The *grounds taken in the argument are sufficiently indicated by the following opinions.

ALLEN, J. The various questions supposed to be presented by the record in this case have been argued with much zeal and ability. But in the view that I have taken of our legislation on the subject, it does not appear to me to be necessary to discuss many of the propositions advanced in the argument. The question presented by the record is, whether, as the law stood on the 1st of January 1840, the banks paying the interest due on that day to the public creditors in specie or its equivalent, were entitled to charge the commonwealth with the premiums or discount which they were subjected to making such payments.

On the 16th of May 1837, the banks suspended specie payments. Prior to the suspension, all the banks were bound by their charters to pay their debts in specie. Two of the banks, of which the appellee was one, were the fiscal agents of the commonwealth. All money due to the commonwealth was deposited in those banks to the credit of the treasury. The notes of all the incorporated banks in the state were receivable in the payment of taxes. With a knowledge of this fact, and of the obligation thereby imposed upon the deposit banks to receive these notes as cash, to debit themselves with that amount as so much money to the credit of the commonwealth, and to pay it as they were bound to pay other debts due by them, these banks undertook to act as the fiscal agents of the commonwealth. It may have been supposed that any responsibility for loss, growing out of the receipt of the notes of the various banks receivable in payment of public taxes, was compensated for by the advantages accruing to the banks as the chosen fiscal agents of the government. However this may be, there is no question 741 raised as to the liability of the banks to pay *the debts they owed to the commonwealth in specie, and that upon a failure to pay in specie they forfeited their corporate privileges.

After the suspension in May 1837, several acts were passed for the temporary relief of the banks. By these acts the forfeitures and penalties incurred by the banks were remitted or suspended, their notes declared to be still receivable in the payment of public taxes, and the public moneys were still to be deposited as theretofore. The last act in this series was passed on the 2d of April 1838, which suspended the laws imposing forfeitures until the 1st of April 1839. During this period of legalized suspension, it became necessary to make some provision for the payment of interest to the public creditor. The commonwealth was bound, by the strongest of all obligations, to guard the public creditor from any loss growing out of the temporary embarrassments of the community, or from her indulgence to her own corporations. With this object the act of March 28, 1838 was passed. The first section, so far as respected the existing debts, was no more than a solemn recognition by the commonwealth of the obligation of her contracts; but taken altogether, seeing that it speaks of future loans as well as the existing debts, it was clearly the object and intention of the legislature that this should be a part of the permanent law. But such a general declaration would have been of little avail towards the support of the public credit, unless some efficient mode had been prescribed for giving it practical effect. The public creditor wanted something more than the "word of promise to the ear." And this was given in the second section, which provided that warrants &c. in payment of interest should be discharged by the banks at which they were made payable, in the manner prescribed by the first section.

742 *This provision, it is insisted, is part of the temporary legislation growing out of the then existing suspension of specie payments, and terminated with it. I do not concur in this construction of the law. There is nothing in the terms of the statute, or any part of it, which indicates an intention that it should expire with the cause which led to the enactment. The second section alone gives efficacy and vitality to the law: without it, the first section, which in terms refers to future times, would be an empty and unmeaning sound. If it was important to the maintenance of public credit through all time, to declare that the commonwealth recognized the obligation which good faith imposed on her; it was oftenfold more importance to provide the mode by which that obligation should be met and discharged. The law, too, regards the public credit, and the mode of preserving it, irrespective of the banks, and has no connexion, in the important particulars referred to, with the legislation concerning them.

The proviso entitling the banks to a credit in account with the commonwealth for the premium or discount they might be subjected to, necessarily refers to the then existing legalized suspension. But it is part of the second section, which I think permanent in its character; and it must, as it seems to me, receive the same construction. It is argued on behalf of the commonwealth, that this provision would be nugatory when the banks were not in a state of suspension, and that it could not have been the intention of the legislature to authorize them to charge this premium in case of a subsequent suspension, no matter under what circumstances occurring. To this I think it may be satisfactorily answered, that no such suspension could be recognized which had not received a legislative sanction. Any other construction would impute to the legislature an intention to hold out inducements for an improper 743 *suspension. If, not only without authority of law, but directly in violation of it, the bank subsequently suspended specie payments, such illegal act could be the foundation of no valid claim. If, during such illegal suspension, it should fail to pay the interest in specie, there could of course be no claim against the commonwealth. But if it should pay the interest in specie, it would do no more than its charter required of it towards all its creditors; and such act, being no more than the performance of a duty, could create no claim. The proviso authorizing the charge would operate whenever, and only when, the law sanctioned a suspension. But whenever a law should so sanction and legalize a suspension of specie payments generally, the act of 1838 would justify the claim to a credit against the commonwealth for the amount of the premium. If the case rested here, and upon this act alone, the claim of the bank would be well founded for all premium or discount it may have been subjected to.

This brings us to the act of December 11, 1839. In the interval between the act of March 1838 and the 11th of December 1839, the banks had resumed specie payments. The laws specially relating to the banks, so far as they remitted forfeitures and suspended penalties, had expired. The banks were again in a regular course of proceeding under the authority of their charters. In October 1839 they again suspended specie payments. Until the act of December 11, 1839 was passed, this suspension was illegal. If, before that act, they had disbursed the public money to the public creditors in payment of interest, such payment would not, as already remarked, have furnished any ground for charge against the commonwealth. No such payment was made; and the act of December 11, 1839 again sanctioned the suspension for eighty days.

If the law had done nothing more,
744 the claim to premiums would *have been clear under the act of 1838. But the whole effect and operation of the act of December 1839, so far as it respected the public moneys on deposit which might be necessary to pay the interest due to public creditors in January following, was controlled by the proviso. The act legalizes the suspension as to the creditors of the banks generally; but, by the proviso, excepts from the effect of such suspension so much of the public money on deposit as might be required to pay the January interest, if there should be so much in the banks to the credit of the commonwealth. I do not consider it important to go into the doctrine how far a subsequent statute is to be considered as a repeal of a former one. In my view, the proviso of the act of 1839 did not repeal, and was not intended to repeal, the act of 1838, or any provision of it; and this because, as to the public money on deposit required to pay interest, the contingency had never happened, upon which alone the act of 1838 could operate. That act, as I have attempted to shew, did not justify the charge for premiums, except when the payment was made during a legalized suspension. The suspension in October 1839 was illegal; and until it was sanctioned, no payment made during its continuance could confer a right to charge the commonwealth. The act of December 1839 gave that sanction, with the one exception before specified; and as to this, the bank was placed in precisely the same condition it would have been in if the act had never passed. When, therefore, it paid the January interest in 1840, it did no more than its charter required. It would have been illegal to refuse; and the performance of a mere legal duty entitles it to no charge against the commonwealth. This construction limits the exception to the interest due in January 1840. For subsequent payments, made after the act of December 1839, and other acts continuing the suspension, 745 it would have been entitled to *the premium under the act of 1838, unless those acts had made some other provision. If, therefore, any loss for premiums was incurred in making payments of interest at subsequent periods, as alleged in argument, such payments were within the act of 1838. And hence too the necessity of the section in the act of March 18, 1840, (Sess. Acts of 1839-40, ch. 65, § 13, p. 55,) respecting the interest falling due in July; a provision in effect similar to that contained in the act of the 11th December 1839, but applying to the July interest only.

This construction reconciles all the acts, and the various provisions contained therein. It gives to the act of 1838, for the support of public credit, the construction obviously necessary to give it any validity. It gives to the proviso in that act the construction which enables the bank to claim a credit for the discount it may have been subjected to, whenever it has seemed expedient to the legislature to give a general sanction to a suspension. It imparts full force and efficacy to the proviso in the act of December 11, 1839, by construing it as excepting from suspension so much of the public money as was required to pay the interest due in the following January; and by limiting its operation to that payment, it leaves the act of 1838 to operate on all subsequent payments made during a period of authorized suspension, and so shews the necessity of the provision in the act of March 18, 1840, for relieving the commonwealth from the charge for premiums on the July interest falling due in that year.

I am therefore of opinion that the charge preferred in this case was properly disallowed by the auditor.

A question of practice has been argued, upon which a decision is desired. The claim being for premiums on payments of interest to the public creditors, it is contended that it should have been pre- 746 ferred to the second *and not to the first auditor, as the warrants for the interest were issued by the second auditor. The first auditor, it is argued, can know nothing of the public debt contracted for purposes of internal improvement, or whether the interest was really due. There is not much weight in this objection.

It was not the business of the bank, to which a warrant for interest was presented, to enquire into the right of the holder to receive the amount. That matter was confided by the commonwealth to her own officers. All that the bank had to do was to see that the warrant was in the form prescribed by law, and authenticated by the proper officers; and, when it paid the holder, to charge the premiums in account with the commonwealth. The amount of those premiums became a claim against the commonwealth, to be audited by the first auditor, the general accounting officer, not upon the evidence of the books on which the public debt was listed, or on which it was transferable, but upon the production of the warrant and check, duly authenticated by the officers authorized to issue and give them.

As to the jurisdiction of the particular court: previous to the division of the jurisdiction of the court between two judges, the same judge had jurisdiction of all such applications. The proceeding was by way of petition, and it would seem to have been of no consequence whether addressed to his common law or to his chancery ear.* He could direct an issue and impanel a jury to try any controverted fact. The division of jurisdiction between two judges does not vary the question. The application may be addressed to either, as convenience may require. And this being a case involving accounts and questions between principal and agent, it would seem to have been most properly addressed to the judge having charge of the chancery side of the court.

747 *STANARD, J. The objections to the channels through which the bank pursued its claim are untenable. The auditor was the proper officer to whom to present the claim, and the judge of the superior court on the chancery side had jurisdiction of the appeal from the decision of the auditor. At all events, no objection being made on this ground in the court below, it ought not to be entertained here.

To determine the validity of the claim preferred by the bank, the material question to be solved is, what is the true construction and effect of the act (and especially of the proviso thereto) of the 11th of December 1839?

This construction depends on the legislative intent. In the earnest and elaborate argument of this case, the counsel on both sides, agreeing in nothing else, properly admitted that that was the essential enquiry. The construction by this court is but the judicial expression of the result of its enquiry, under the guidance of well considered and established rules, into the intent of the legislature, and is just and sound only so far as it successfully ascertains and gives effect to that intent.

The bank founds its title to the reclamation it makes of the commonwealth on the act of the 28th of March 1838, which declares by its 1st section, that the interest which should thereafter accrue for public loans, made prior or subsequent thereto, should be paid in current gold and silver coins of the United States, or in their equivalent, at the option of the holder; and by its 2d section, that the warrants on the banks for such interest shall be paid as prescribed by the 1st section, with a proviso that the banks shall be entitled to credit in account with the commonwealth for whatever premium or discount they might be subjected to in making payment of those warrants.

The argument is, that this law was indefinite in its duration and has never 748 been repealed, and that the *claim under it to the reclamation in question is compatible with the intent of the proviso in the act of December 1839; in other words, that, on sound principles of construction, an intent cannot be judicially imputed to the legislature to exempt the payment by the banks of the interest on the public loans falling due in January 1840 from the operation of the 2d section of the act of March 1838.

On the other hand, it is insisted that the proviso to the 2d section of the act of 28th March 1838 was temporary, made for the existing occasion of suspended specie payments, and that it became, on the resumption of specie payments by the banks, functus officio.

In maintenance of these conflicting propositions, the counsel have very properly brought under the notice of the court the various acts of the legislature from the period of the first suspension in May 1837 until the close of the second suspension, as sources from which light, of more or less distinctness, might be shed on the enquiry into the intent of the legislature in its different enactments, and especially in the proviso to the act of 11th December 1839.

At the time of the first suspension of the banks, the laws then existing enforced specie payments by forfeitures and heavy penalties for failing to make them. It was by these sanctions that the rights of the creditors of the banks to have their demands paid in specie were guarded. The acts of the extra session of 1837 and of the session of 1837-8 suspended the laws inflicting those forfeitures and penalties, and though they did not protect the banks from demands for specie, removed the sanctions by which such demands were to be enforced. The suspension, though not unconditionally legalized, was tolerated, by the removal of those sanctions, and by the further provision that the public taxes should be payable in the notes of the banks, and that executions for public dues

749 might be discharged in such *notes as were receivable for taxes. The proviso to the act of the 28th March 1838 was passed during such period of tolerated suspension by the banks of specie payments, when all the sanctions intended to coerce such payments were by law suspended, and of course the creditors of the banks, and among them the holders of warrants for the interest of public loans, were disarmed of the means previously provided by law to compel the payment in specie of their claims. That proviso, passed during a time of suspension, was applicable only to the exigencies arising from that condition of things. On the resumption of specie payments by the banks, either voluntarily, or under the coercion arising from the expiration of the suspension of the laws inflicting penalties and forfeitures for failing to pay specie, the warrants for the interest on the public loans would be payable in specie, and the banks could not refuse so to pay them without forfeiting their charters to the state, and becoming responsible to the holders of such warrants, upon motion on ten days notice, for 10 per cent. damages and 15 per cent. interest. Whatever construction may be given to the act of 28th March 1838, from the nature of things it became dormant after the resumption of specie payments, and reinstatement of the forfeitures and penalties for failing to make them, and continued so during the continuance of such payments.

The proviso in the act of 28th March 1838 thus becoming dormant from the resumption of specie payments, and necessarily continuing so until a suspension of those payments, it is indispensable for the counsel of the bank to maintain that such suspension revived it. For if, as the counsel of the commonwealth contends, it became functus officio on the resumption of specie payments, and could only be resuscitated by subsequent legislation, the foundation of the claim of the bank is taken away. The revival and renewed activity of that 750 proviso might result either from the simple *act of suspension of specie payments, operating ipso facto its resuscitation until repealed or modified by subsequent legislation; or from the restoration by law of the state of things in which it had its birth, to wit, a suspension of specie payments, so far tolerated by law, as the exemption of the bank from forfeitures and penalties, and the withdrawal from its creditor of the aid of those legal sanctions by which specie payments were to be coerced, imply such toleration.

The counsel of the bank insists that suspension of specie payments ipso facto restored activity to the proviso in the 2d section of the act of March 1838, so that if the suspension had occurred before the payment of the interest on the state loans that became due in July 1839, and the bank had paid that interest with the specie from its vaults, or had purchased specie with its notes at a premium, or delivered its notes at a discount to make them equal to specie, it would have been entitled to charge the commonwealth not only the nominal amount of the warrants for the interest, but a further sum equal to the premium at which specie sold in the market for the notes of the bank, or the premium paid for such specie, or the discount of such notes. If the counsel be right, the title to make this charge must exist irrespective of the conduct of the bank in suspending, unaided by legislative acquiescence in the suspension, and in spite of any legislative resistance to it: the bank might discharge its debt to the commonwealth by discharging a claim on the commonwealth less, by the amount of the depreciation of its notes, than the amount of such debt; and the only plea to sustain the claim would be founded on its own act in direct violation of law, subjecting its charter to forfeiture, and incurring a responsibility to its creditor much larger than the premium on the specie it might have paid. Would it not be an unexampled incongruity in the law, at the same time that it denounces 751 *against the bank the forfeiture of its charter to the state, and heavy responsibility to the creditor who is not paid in specie, to allow it to found on the act incurring such forfeiture and responsibility a title to discharging its debt by casting on the creditor all loss resulting from the depreciation caused by that act?

That it was not intended by the act of March 1838 to confer on the banks a legal right, on any future suspension, irrespective of the circumstances of justification or excuse for such suspension, and of the legislative discretion acting on such circumstances, to discharge their responsibilities, to the extent of the interest on the public loans, by charging to the commonwealth the amount of the premium on specie, or of the depreciation of their own notes, in addition to the amount of the public debt paid while the aforesaid laws of forfeiture and penalty were in full activity, is evidenced by the consideration that in such a predicament this legal right could at the discretion of the legislature be rendered wholly nugatory. Had the banks suspended before the month of July 1839, and paid the July dividend in specie or specie funds purchased at a premium, of what avail would the legal right to charge that premium to the commonwealth be, when encountered by the legislative will resisting that claim, and the responsibilities of the banks incurred by the act of suspension, and which the legislature had the power to enforce? Suppose the banks and the commonwealth accounting together in respect to such payment. The banks claim to debit the commonwealth with the premium paid for specie, or the depreciation of their notes. The legislature, representing the commonwealth, enquires what has caused this premium or depreciation. The banks answer, "We have been compelled to violate our legal obligations, and refuse the payment of our debts in specie or its equivalent."

The legislature rejoins, "If you have 752 paid these claims *in specie or its equivalent, you have but discharged the duty imposed by law, and enforced by its strongest sanctions; and if this charge is made because that duty had been violated, then the very act by which only you have been subjected to pay this premium, or to suffer this depreciation, has subjected you to the forfeiture of your charter, and to 10 per cent. damages and 15 per cent. interest on the amount of the debt you have refused to pay in specie or its equivalent; and without discussing the question whether you had a legal right, under the act of March 1838, to make the charge against our will, that will is sufficient to enforce the law you have violated, and thereby to subject you to a much heavier loss than will be averted by the successful assertion of your legal right under the proviso of the act of March 1838." It is therefore obvious, that unless the legislature should choose to assent to or acquiesce in the claim of the banks to credit for the premium on specie or its equivalent, used in paying the interest on the state loans while the laws denouncing penalties and forfeitures for the suspension of specie payments were in full vigour, the supposed legal right of the banks under the proviso of the act of March 1838, might at the discretion of the legislature be rendered utterly abortive: and the conclusion seems to me most cogent, that no such legal right, irrespective of or in opposition to the legislative will, results from that act; and that, having become dormant on the resumption of specie payments after its passage, a subsequent suspension, not sanctioned or tolerated by law, did not ipso facto resuscitate it. The most that can be said is, that it would be resuscitated when the state of things existing at the time of its passage should recur, to wit, a suspension tolerated so far as the withdrawal of the legal sanctions of forfeiture and penalty for failure to pay specie would import such toleration. A benign consideration of the question might, and I 753 think *probably would, justify the construction which would sustain such revival, either as the proper exposition of the original act, or as a fair implication of legislative intention from the enactment by which the status existing in March 1838, in respect to the unconditional exemption of the banks from penalty and forfeiture for failing to pay specie, should be restored. That such would be the effect of the exceptionless restoration of the said status of March 1838, was probably the construction of the legislature, when the act of 18th March 1840, continuing until the 1st of April 1841 the suspension of the forfeitures and penalties for failing to pay specie, provided that the premiums for the specie or specie funds, in which the interest on the public loans falling due in July 1840 might be discharged, should be paid by the banks; and such the construction which, in the opinion of the officers of the commonwealth, justified an allowance said to be made to the banks in account for such premiums during the tolerated suspension posterior to July 1840.

When the act of 11th December 1839 was passed, the banks were exposed to demands for specie for all their responsibilities on their notes, or on checks or warrants on general deposits with them, and liable to heavy penalties in the form of damages and a high rate of interest for failure to meet those demands. The function of that act was to withdraw, by suspending for a time, those sanctions by which the rights of the creditors of the banks were to be enforced. Had the suspension of the penalties and forfeitures been exceptionless, then the status of March 1838 would have been restored, and with it activity given to the proviso of the act of March 1838. But the suspension of the penalties and forfeitures was not exceptionless. It was qualified by the proviso that the interest on the state loans falling due in January 1840 should be paid by the banks in specie or its 754 equivalent. And the effect *of that proviso is the material question, to the elucidation and solution of which the foregoing review and exposition of the previous legislation has been deemed by me apposite, if not necessary.

Whether the proviso be regarded as an exception of the class of claims specified in it from the suspensive effect of the body of the act on the sanctions by which the obligations of the banks to their creditors were guarded, so as to leave those sanctions in full effect in respect to the specified class, while in respect to others they were temporarily withdrawn; or as a condition, on the nonperformance of which the suspension of those sanctions in respect to all claims would terminate, and the banks be exposed to forfeiture and penalty to the same extent as they would in case the act had not been passed, it must, I think, have the same interpretation, as to the intent in respect to the liability of the banks or the commonwealth for the premiums for specie or specie funds in which the interest on the state loans falling due in January should be paid. In either view, it left all those sanctions in full activity in respect to the claimants of the January interest on the public loans, and pro hac vice the rights and responsibilities of the banks were as if the act had not passed. Any payment made of those claims would necessarily stand on no better ground than if the act of December had not passed; and had not that act passed (if the view heretofore taken be correct) the banks would not be entitled to charge to the commonwealth the premium of specie, or depreciation of their notes, in which the interest might be paid. If this was not the intent of the proviso, what other function can reasonably be ascribed to it?

The able counsel of the bank anticipated this question, and discerned the conclusion necessarily flowing from the inability to give a sufficient answer to it; and he has ingeniously suggested, that whereas 755 the act of *March 1838, while it entitled the banks to charge the premiums paid for specie or specie funds when they were provided and applied by them to the discharge of the interest on the public loans, imposed on them no obligation secured by adequate sanctions to provide and apply such funds to that object, the proviso in the act of December 1839 supplied that sanction, and that was its proper and adequate function. That such was not its intended function I think is perfectly clear.

What are the banks authorized by the act of March 1838 to do? To discharge the debts due the commonwealth in paper depreciated when compared with specie, and charge the nominal amount of the depreciated paper to the commonwealth. In effect that act rather confers a privilege than imposes a duty on the banks, and it is not probable that the legislature could deem it necessary to enforce by any sanction the exercise of that which, though in words imposing a duty, in substance confers a privilege. The argument of the counsel for the bank supposes that the existing and operating law, as understood by the legislature, entitled the banks to charge the premiums in question to the commonwealth (in other words, to pay the commonwealth the nominal amount of their depreciated paper in discharging a smaller debt of the commonwealth), and then that the legislature, by the proviso in question, proceeded to menace the banks with forfeiture and heavy penalties if this privilege were not exercised. Surely it could not enter into the mind of the legislature that such coercion was necessary. If the law authorized the banks (specie bearing a premium of ten per cent. or bank notes being depreciated that amount) to extinguish a debt due by them to the commonwealth of 110 dollars, by paying notes to that amount, or specie purchased with that amount of notes, to a creditor of the commonwealth in discharge of a claim of 100 dollars, what possible motive, interest, or even right, 756 could they *have to refuse? The transaction might benefit but could not injure the banks. To assign such a function to the proviso would, giving expression to this interpretation, make it read thus: "provided, that the banks shall pay to the claimants of the interest on state loans falling due in January, specie or notes, for which they shall have credit with the commonwealth to the full nominal amount of the notes, or of the specie with the premium paid for it." Such a proviso would have been supererogatory, if not ridiculous; and therefore the construction which impresses that meaning upon the proviso actually used cannot be just.

That the legislature did not intend that the banks should have credit with the commonwealth for the excess of the value of specie, or for premiums paid for it, is further evinced by the circumstance that the proviso makes the duty of paying the January interest in specie dependant on the indebtedness of the banks to the commonwealth, and limits their liability to make the payment in specie or its equivalent, to the amount that might be to the credit of the commonwealth. Surely it cannot be doubted that the legislature supposed, that if there was as much to the credit of the commonwealth in the banks as would pay the interest, the banks would, under the proviso, be compelled to pay the whole interest; and yet, if the proviso be so interpreted as to leave the banks at liberty to charge the premium on specie to the commonwealth, it would, in the predicament supposed, be unavailing to secure the payment of the whole interest in specie.

On this enquiry into the intent of the legislature, it is not irrelevant to advert to the fact that the same assembly which enacted the law of December 11, 1839, a law obviously passed under jealous if not hostile feelings to the banks, and limiting the qualified toleration of the suspension to eighty days, by a subsequent act passed after a more thorough investigation, 757 and upon a *more indulgent consideration of the necessities under which the suspension of specie payments had taken place, extended the toleration for more than twelve months, yet required that the banks should bear the loss of the premiums on specie or specie funds to pay the interest falling due before the next session of the legislature, to wit, in July 1840. It cannot be supposed that the same legislature which imposed this loss upon the banks at a time when, on deliberate investigation, they were deemed entitled to this more liberal indulgence, intended, by the more stinted and jealous indulgence accorded by the previous act, to exempt them from that loss.

On the whole, my opinion is that the banks were not entitled to the premium of the specie, or specie funds, with which the interest on the public loans falling due in January 1840 was paid; and that the decree of the court below be reversed, and the appeal from the decision of the auditor dismissed.

BROOKE, J. There are two impressions that have great influence in ruling this case, neither of which I think justified by any thing in the record or in the law. One is, that the bank, as the fiscal agent of the state, was bound to pay the interest on the public debt, without any allowance for the difference in the value of specie and bank paper during the suspension of specie payments. I find nothing in the record or in the law, which constitutes the bank the fiscal agent of the state, in any other degree than it is the fiscal agent of all who deposit money with it, and draw out such money by checks. The deposit of the money collected for public taxes may afford to the bank a temporary addition to its capital, upon which it may trade: and so may every deposit made by individuals. But that, I think, does not constitute the bank the fiscal agent of individual depositors, and oblige it to pay their checks in specie 758 during *the suspension of specie payments; though it may be said they have higher claims than the state, which owns half the stock, and has four votes out of nine in the directory (and may have five if it will) on the question of the suspension of specie payments.

The other impression is, that the release of the forfeitures incurred by the suspension of specie payments was a great boon to the banks. There is nothing in the record to shew that the suspension was not justified by the condition of the currency at the time, or that it was not necessary to prevent the drawing of all the specie from the vaults of the banks. The forfeitures incurred by the suspension must then be released, or the banks forced into liquidation; which would have been more calamitous to the country than to them. It would have been ruinous to the debtor portion of the community to be compelled to pay their bank debts, and others also, with a limited currency. The sale of their property would bankrupt the greater number of them. And in what could the taxes be collected? In the actual condition of things, it was impossible for the state to refuse to release the forfeitures; and I cannot see that it was any boon to the banks, for which they were under an obligation to pay the interest on the public debt without compensation for the difference in the value of specie and paper during the suspension. The stockholders, other than the state, would feel no greater interest in the payment of the interest on the public debt than any other citizens of the commonwealth. These views will be much strengthened by the consideration that a large amount of the deposits of the state was in the paper of the western banks, which had been received for taxes, and was depreciated below the value of the paper of the banks in which it was deposited.

I think, therefore, that these impressions ought to have no influence in the decision of the case.

759. *Disregarding them, and turning to the acts of the legislature applicable to the case, I think there can be no doubt that the compensation claimed by the bank, for the difference in value of paper and the specie which it paid in discharge of the interest on the public debt, ought to be paid by the state. The proviso in the act of 1839, it is admitted, did not repeal the second section of the act of 1838. That section expressly provides that the banks should be entitled to a credit in account with the commonwealth for all premiums or discount to which they might be subjected in order to render their paper equivalent to specie. The act of the 11th December 1839 refers to the payment of the interest on the public debt falling due on the first of January 1840, and directs that the deposit banks shall pay such interest, if required, in specie or its equivalent. One would suppose that the sole object was to authorize the banks to pay the public creditors the interest on the public debt. It was quite unnecessary to repeat the terms on which the payment was to be made; those terms being before stated in the second section of the act of 1838. All the cases cited in argument shew that a law is not to be repealed by implication. I shall not examine their application to this case. I think the inference from the act of 18th March 1840 proves that the legislature did not intend, by the proviso in the act of 1839, to repeal the second section of the act of 1838. The 13th section of the said act of 1840 declares that the deposit banks "shall pay the semiannual interest due from the commonwealth in the month of July next, in specie or its equivalent, if so required by the creditors, without charging any premium therefor." If the legislature had considered the act of 1839 as repealing the second section in the act of 1838, this refusal in the act of 1840 to compensate the banks for premiums and discount would have been entirely superfluous.

760 *On the merits, supposing those acts of the legislature out of the case, what claim had the state on the other stockholders to pay the interest on the public debt without compensation for the loss on the premiums paid for specie? I cannot perceive any.

In every view of the case, I think the decree was right, and that it ought to be affirmed.

BALDWIN, J., concurred with judges Allen and Stanard in reversing the decree of the court of chancery, and dismissing the petition of the bank. And it was decreed accordingly.

Arbitration and Award†—What Submission Is Binding and Entitles to Specific Execution of Award.—An equitable title to land of which an intestate died seized being set up against his heirs, some of the heirs and the claimants enter into an agreement under seal, referring the matter to arbitration, and the arbitrators award in favour of the claimants, and direct a conveyance by the heirs of their interest in the land to the claimants: HELD, it was competent for the adult heirs who were sui juris to enter into the submission, notwithstanding there were other heirs interested in the subject who were not parties; that the award made in pursuance of such submission is binding on the parties to such submission, according to the terms thereof; and that, upon a bill in equity for the purpose, specific execution may be decreed against such parties to the submission, and a conveyance compelled of such legal title to the land as has descended to them respectively. Accord. Smith and others v. Smith &c., 4 Rand. 95.

Same—Specific Execution in Part.—Such decree will be without prejudice to the right of the plaintiffs to proceed at law for a failure to comply with the submission and award in any other respect.

John B. Magruder having purchased a tract of land in the county of Albemarle, on which his sister Mrs. Mary Boyd resided during her life, the heirs of Mrs. Boyd, after her death and the death of her brother, claimed that he intended the purchase for his sister, and had so declared, and that in fact the land was paid for by her, or by her brother out of funds of hers in his hands; and they insisted that there was a resulting trust for her in the land. To adjust the controversy growing out of this claim, the heirs of Mrs. Boyd and some of the heirs of Magruder entered into an agreement under seal, submitting the matter to arbitrators; the parties to the submission agreeing that all others interested, whether adults or infants, should, as well 762 *as themselves, submit to and perform whatever award should be made. The arbitrators awarded (amongst other things) that the heirs of Mrs. Boyd were entitled to the land, and that Magruder's heirs should convey their interest therein to them. But Magruder's heirs refused to execute such conveyance. Whereupon a bill in equity was filed by Boyd's heirs, insisting, that though some of the heirs of Magruder were infants or females covert, there should nevertheless be a decree for a conveyance by them, upon the ground of the original resulting trust.

John B. Magruder junior, one of the parties to the submission, having died intestate without issue, whereby his interest in the land descended to his mother, brothers and sisters and their descendants, an amended bill was filed, making defendants thereto as well the parties bound by the submission, as the other heirs of the said John B. Magruder junior, and praying a conveyance, according to the provisions of the award, of whatever legal title might be in the defendants.

Answers had been filed to the original bill; but this amended bill was taken for confessed.

The cause coming on to be heard before the circuit court of Albemarle the 17th of May 1836, that court decreed that the bills be dismissed with costs.

From which decree an appeal was allowed on the petition of Boyd's heirs, insisting, 1. that upon the proofs in the cause they were entitled to relief against all the defendants; and 2. if not against all, that they were clearly entitled to a decree against the parties to the submission, for a conveyance of the land with special warranty; for which was cited Smith &c. v. Smith &c., 4 Rand. 95.

*He had been counsel for the appellants.

†See monographic note on "Arbitration and Award" appended to Bassett v. Cunningham, 9 Gratt. 684.

The cause was argued by Lyons, Stanard and C. Johnson for the appellants, and by Leigh for the appellees.

763 *ALLEN, J., delivered the following as the opinion of the court:

The court, without considering whether, under the circumstances disclosed in the record of this case, it would be competent to set up and establish by oral testimony such a resulting trust for the benefit of Mary Boyd in the lands described, as by the bill is alleged, is of opinion that the testimony relied on does not prove that said lands were in fact paid for by said Mary Boyd, or that the purchase money was discharged out of any funds belonging to her in the hands of the said John B. Magruder deceased; and that although said John B. Magruder may have intended said purchase to be for the benefit of his sister the said Mary, and have so declared, such intention and declaration, in the absence of satisfactory proof of the payment of the purchase money, could create no resulting trust in her favour. The court is therefore of opinion that there was no error in the decree, so far as it determined that the heirs of said Mary Boyd deceased were not entitled to demand from such of the heirs of said John B. Magruder deceased, who were not parties to or bound by the said submission and award, a conveyance of the legal title descended to them from their father or ancestor the said John B. Magruder deceased.

The court is further of opinion, that it was competent for the adult heirs who were sui juris to enter into the submission in the proceedings mentioned, notwithstanding there were other heirs interested in the subject who were not parties; that the award made in pursuance of such submission is binding on the parties to the submission, according to the terms thereof; and that the plaintiffs are entitled, as against such parties to the submission who laboured under no disability of coverture, to a specific execution of the award, by a conveyance of any legal title to the lands aforesaid which has descended to them respectively, and also to their legal remedy for any breach of the award or agreement of submission in any other respect.

764 *The court is further of opinion, that as it appears by the amended bill, which has been taken for confessed, that John B. Magruder junior, one of the parties to the submission, has departed this life intestate and without issue, whereby his interest in said lands has descended to his mother, brothers and sisters and their descendants, those who were not parties to or bound by the award, as well as those who were, are necessary parties in a suit by the plaintiffs to procure a conveyance of the legal title vested in said John B. Magruder junior; and therefore it was erroneous to dismiss the bill as to any of the defendants, as the plaintiffs, to this extent, were entitled to relief against all.

The court is further of opinion, that as the parties bound by the award were made defendants by the amended bill, which was taken for confessed, under the allegations thereof the specific execution of the award, by a conveyance of the interest in the lands held by the parties bound by the award, was the only matter in issue, and the only relief which can properly be given is a decree for a conveyance to the plaintiffs, by the parties bound by the award and their representatives, of such interest in said lands as was vested in said parties bound by the award, with covenants of special warranty; but such decree to be without prejudice to the right of the plaintiffs to proceed at law for any other matter embraced in the award, or to recover for any failure to comply with the terms of the award and the submission in any other respect.

The court is therefore of opinion, that said decree dismissing the original and amended bills with costs was erroneous, and that the same be reversed with costs. And the cause is remanded to the circuit court, with leave to make any new parties, should that have been rendered necessary by death or otherwise, and to be finally proceeded in according to the principles above declared.

Summerfield v. The Commonwealth.

June. 1843.

Criminal Law—Bail—What is No Ground for Allowing—

Case at Bar.—A prisoner having been examined by the county court and remanded for trial for the offence of feloniously passing two counterfeit half eagles, one of them to J. C. and the other to W. M., two indictments are found against him, in one of which he is charged with passing one of the counterfeit coins to J. C. on the 13th of October 1842, in the other with passing the other 768 *coin to W. M. on the same day. Upon a trial of one of the indictments, the jury find the prisoner not guilty. Held, his acquittal in that case does not entitle him to be let to bail in the other.

At a court held for Giles county the 18th of January 1843, for the examination of Elijah Summerfield, "charged with having feloniously passed, on or about the 13th day of October last past, in the county of Giles, two certain base and counterfeit pieces of coin, purporting to be gold half eagles or five dollar pieces, such as are current in this commonwealth, one of which he passed in payment to John M. Cunningham, and the other to William B. Mason, the said Elijah Summerfield knowing the said coin to be base and counterfeit," the court was of opinion "that the prisoner is guilty of the offence wherewith he stands charged, and that he be further tried in the next circuit superior court for the county of Giles." In the warrant for convening the court, the charge was set forth in the same terms as in the record of the examination.

In the circuit court, at May term 1843, two indictments were found against the prisoner; in one of which he was charged with passing a counterfeit half eagle to John M. Cunningham on the 13th of October 1842, in the other with passing a like coin to William B. Mason on the same day. A trial being had on the first mentioned indictment, the jury found the prisoner not guilty, and he was acquitted. Whereupon, on the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, the trial of the other indictment was postponed till the next term, and the prisoner was remanded to jail.

He now applied, by petition to the general court, to be let to bail on the indictment last aforesaid. The transcript of the record filed with his petition did not shew what was the evidence against him, either in the court of examination, or upon his trial in the circuit court.

769 *Lyons, W. B. Preston and N. Harrison, for the petitioner, submitted a written argument of the case.

Two alternatives, they said, were presented by the record. Either the charge for which the prisoner was remanded was but one offence in law, and would consequently authorize but one indictment; or it constituted two substantive and distinct offences, which might either be comprised in a single indictment, or made the subject of two. In either view, the petitioner is bailable. In the former, he is of course bailable, for then the second indictment ought never to have been permitted by the court, and he can never be required to answer it. It is obvious from the record, that neither the committing magistrate nor the examining court made any discrimination of the charge, but considered the whole of it as constituting a single offence. The court examined and remanded the prisoner as for a single offence. Nor does it follow that there was error in doing so. It is certainly not impossible for a man to pass two different pieces of coin, and to two different persons, under such circumstances as to make it but a single simultaneous and continuous act of passing; as much so as the uttering of several forged receipts, which it has been decided may constitute only one offence. 1 Chitty's Cr. L. 253; 2 Russ. on Crimes 468; Thomas's case, 2 Leach 882.

At all events the offences here might have been joined in the same indictment. 1 Chitty's Cr. L. ch. 5, p. 237, 249, 253. And as they were charges of the same character, and not even differing in degree, it was not proper to disjoin them. The people v. Rynders, 12 Wend. 429; The people v. Gates, 13 Wend. 311; Harman v. The commonwealth, 12 Serg. & Rawle 72. There was certainly no necessity in this case for two indictments; the prisoner did not ask that the charges might be separately tried, and the court would have been justified in overruling his application, if he had asked 770 it. *The consequence of the separation has been oppressive, for he is now in prison on a charge of which otherwise he would probably have been acquitted.

But conceding not only that the record shews two offences, but that two indictments were admissible, the case of Green v. Commonwealth, 11 Leigh 677, is relied upon as establishing that the acquittal of the prisoner on the first indictment furnishes such a presumption of his innocence in the other case as entitles him to be let to bail. Green's case is in fact stronger than this. There the offences were not only separate and distinct, but had relation to separate and distinct periods of time. Here both the indictments have reference to the same period, that is, the 13th of October 1842. There, there was obviously more discrepancy in the charges, and less dependency in the proof, so that an acquittal in the first case was a more uncertain criterion as to the others. It might there have been urged, that though the commonwealth had failed on one indictment, she might succeed on others; that though the prisoner had been acquitted of aiding and abetting the embezzlement, yet the evidence might shew conclusively that he was guilty of the larceny. The presumption "that the commonwealth has put the prisoner upon his trial in the case in which the proof against him was strongest," is at least as fair in respect to this petitioner as it was in respect to Green: and if Green's acquittal in one case furnished such a presumption of his innocence in twenty-three others as entitled him to bail, the acquittal of this petitioner surely furnishes an equivalent presumption in respect to the single case yet pending against him.

Criminal Law—Jurors—Opinion Formed—Competency*

—Case at Bar.—On the separate trial of a prisoner jointly indicted with three others for murder, several persons called as jurors are examined on voir dire touching their indifference. 1. One of them states, that he has heard rumours and conversations in the country touching the case of the prisoner, and a representation of part of the evidence given on the trial of one of the parties indicted with him, and from these sources of information, if the same be true, he had made up an opinion of decided character, which he still entertains, and which will remain the same unless removed by evidence of a state of facts different from what he has heard; but he feels no prejudice or bias for or against the prisoner, and is satisfied that the opinion so formed and entertained would have no influence upon his mind in trying him, and that he could now give him as impartial a trial upon the evidence as if he had heard nothing of his case. 2. Another juror states, that he has heard no evidence in relation to the prisoner's case, nor formed any opinion on the question of his guilt or innocence; that he was present at the trial of another of the parties indicted, and heard a part of the evidence, from which he had formed a decided opinion as to that party, and if he were now called to try him, he should be influenced thereby; but that opinion would have no influence upon his mind in trying this prisoner, as to whom he feels no prejudice or prepossession, and he thinks he could try him as fairly and impartially as if he had heard nothing about the transaction. 3. A third juror states, that he heard the reports in the country concerning the death of the deceased, and the prisoners implicated therein, and had formed some opinion thereon, dependant upon the truth and fulness of those reports; he believed them to be true at the time he heard them, and the opinion formed on them was decided, and yet rests upon his mind; but he is satisfied the opinion so formed would have no influence upon him in trying the prisoner, and that he could now try him according to the evidence, free from any leaning or bias for or against him, and decide the case as impartially as if he had previously heard nothing of it. Held, all of these persons are good and impartial jurors.

772 Same—New Trial—What Conviction Will Not Be Set Aside as Contrary to Evidence.*†—Where a verdict of conviction in a criminal case is clearly against the evidence, or clearly without evidence to justify it, it is the duty of the court to set the verdict aside on the application of the prisoner, and to award him a new trial. But where, upon evidence merely circumstantial, the jury has found the prisoner guilty, and the court which tried the case has refused to grant a new trial, the verdict will not be disturbed by the general court, even though, in the opinion of that court, the evidence do not amount to very strong and clear proof.

Same—Murder—Sufficiency of Evidence.—Case in which, under the circumstance just mentioned, a conviction of murder in the second degree was sustained by the general court.

William Turner, Daniel F. M'Cune, Jackson Cottrell and Joseph W. Parsons were jointly indicted, in the circuit superior court of Kanawha county at May term 1843, for the murder of Jonathan Nichols. Upon separate trials of M'Cune, Cottrell and Parsons, they were respectively found guilty of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary; M'Cune and Cottrell each for the term of eighteen years, and Parsons for the term of five years.

I. On the trial of M'Cune, William Earle being called as a juror, and sworn and examined on his voir dire, stated, that he had heard none of the evidence on any of the previous examinations of the prisoner, but had heard the rumours and reports in the country concerning this case, and conversations respecting the same, and from what he had thus heard he had made up and expressed a pretty decided opinion thereon, if they be true, which opinion was unchanged by any thing he had since heard; but if the evidence should present the facts differently from the relations which he had heard, then there would be no opinion resting on his mind, drawn from the rumours and conversations aforesaid: that he felt no leaning or prejudice for or against the prisoner, and notwithstanding the rumours and reports which he had heard, and the opinions or 773 conclusions of *his mind if these reports be true, he was satisfied that he could now try the prisoner as fairly and impartially upon the evidence that might be adduced, as if he had never heard of him or his case. Whereupon the court decided that Earle was a competent juror, and he was put to the election of the prisoner; who excepted to the opinion of the court, and challenged the juror peremptorily.

II. On the trial of Cottrell, — Baber, Henry C. Sisson and Isham Bailey being called as jurors, were severally sworn on the voir dire, and examined touching their indifference.

1. Baber stated, that he had heard rumours and conversations in the country concerning the occurrences in which the prisoner was charged with being a participator, which were much talked about: that during the trial of M'Cune, who was jointly indicted with the prisoner and tried at this term, the juror had been present in court, but heard none of the evidence, though he heard some of the arguments, and he thinks a part of the argument by the attorney for the commonwealth: that upon the rumours and conversations aforesaid, if they be true, he had formed an opinion of decided character, which was still abiding on his mind: but that such opinion, so formed from the sources aforesaid, and what he had heard, would have no influence upon him in trying the prisoner's case: that he felt no prejudice, leaning or bias for or against the prisoner, and was satisfied that he could now give him a fair and impartial trial according to the evidence which he might hear.

2. Sisson stated, that he had heard rumours and frequent conversations in the country touching the case of the prisoner and of others indicted with him: that a person who represented himself as being present at a part of one or both of the trials of M'Cune and Turner during the present term, had related in his presence a 774 *part of the evidence said to have been given in: that from these sources of information, if the information be true, the juror had made up an opinion of decided character, which he still entertained, dependant however upon the fulness and accuracy of the representations which he had heard: that he felt no prejudice, leaning or bias for or against the prisoner, who was a stranger to him; and he was satisfied that what he had heard in relation to his case, and the opinions formed thereon as before described, and resting upon the grounds aforesaid, would have no influence upon his mind in trying the cause; he believed he could now give the prisoner as fair and impartial a trial upon the evidence to be adduced, as if he had heard nothing about him or his cause. In answer to a question by the prisoner's counsel, whether the opinion he now entertained would not remain the same unless removed by evidence of a different state of facts? he said, that it would.

3. Bailey stated, that he had heard divers rumours and conversations in the country relative to the case of the prisoner and his associates in the indictment: that the affair had been considerably talked of in the neighbourhood; and from these rumours and conversations, if true, the juror had made up an opinion of decided character, but which was necessarily dependant upon the fulness and accuracy of the reports he had heard: that his mind was free from prejudice, bias or leaning for or against the prisoner, who was unknown to him; he was satisfied the opinion before stated would have no influence upon his mind in trying the cause; and he believed that notwithstanding the rumours and conversations aforesaid, he could give the prisoner as fair and impartial a trial upon the evidence that might be adduced in his case, as if he had previously heard nothing in relation thereto. In answer to a question by the prisoner's counsel, whether the opinion he 775 now entertained would not remain the same unless removed *by evidence of a different state of facts? he said, that it would.

The court decided that Baber, Sisson and Bailey were all competent jurors; to which opinions the prisoner filed exceptions, and challenged the jurors peremptorily.

III. On the trial of Parsons, John Forqueran and Dioclesian Martin being called as jurors, were severally sworn on the voir dire, and examined touching their indifference.

1. Forqueran stated, that he had not been present at any previous examination of the prisoner, nor heard any evidence in relation to his cause, nor formed any opinion on the question of his guilt or innocence: that upon a former day of the term, he was present at the trial of M'Cune, jointly indicted with the prisoner for the murder of Nichols, when he heard a part of the evidence, and a portion of the arguments of counsel: that from what he then heard, he formed a decided opinion as to M'Cune, and if he were now called to try him, he should be influenced thereby: but that as to the prisoner Parsons, he had no prejudice or prepossession, and he thought he should be able to try him as fairly and impartially as if he had heard nothing about the transaction; that the opinion formed as to M'Cune would have no influence upon his mind in trying the prisoner. The court was of opinion, that although the evidence as to the manner in which Nichols was killed might be the same on the trial of each of the persons indicted, yet as the proofs and circumstances indicating the presence and cooperation of each, as well as the evidence of previous threats, and circumstances indicating ill blood and revenge towards Nichols, must be and were strictly confined to the separate prisoners as they respectively came upon trial, an opinion formed as to the guilt or innocence of any one of them did not *implicate another, whose guilt or innocence depended upon his presence and giving aid, assistance or cooperation in the murder; and therefore Forqueran, who had formed no opinion as to the prisoner Parsons having participated in the transaction, and was in a state of mind fairly and impartially to try his case, was a competent juror.

2. Martin stated, that he had heard the reports in the country concerning the death of Nichols, and the prisoners implicated therein, and had formed some opinion thereon, dependant upon the truth and fulness of the reports he had heard; but he was satisfied that these reports, and the opinion formed on them, would have no influence upon his mind in trying the prisoner, and that he could now pass upon his case according to the evidence, free from any leaning or bias for or against him, and decide it as impartially as if he had previously heard nothing of it. In answer to a question by the prisoner's counsel, he said that the opinion formed on the reports which he had heard was decided; that the rumours and conversations before referred to he believed to be true at the time he heard them; and that the opinion aforesaid yet rested on his mind: but as to the case of this prisoner, he again repeated the declaration herein before set out. The court, considering the rumours and conversations aforesaid as relating to the general circumstances of Nichols's death, and hypothetical in their character, nowise disturbing the impartiality of the juror in passing upon the separate case of the prisoner, decided that this also was a competent juror.

The prisoner peremptorily challenged both of the jurors Forqueran and Martin, and excepted to the opinions of the court deciding them to be competent.

When the verdict of the jury was rendered against him, he moved the court to set it aside and to award him a new trial, upon the ground that the said verdict *was contrary to the evidence; which motion being overruled, he filed a bill of exceptions to the opinion of the court, wherein the facts proved at the trial were set forth as follows.

The widow of the deceased Jonathan Nichols proved, that on the night of the 8th of April last, soon after dark, her husband went to bed in ordinary health. In a short time thereafter the witness went to bed also, in the same bed, together with her youngest child. When she went to bed, she found her husband asleep, lying on his back on the back side of the bed. At the time she lay down, she left a wood fire burning on the hearth, which gave a tolerable light in the room. The house occupied by the deceased was a log cabin, 16 by 18 feet square, with two clap-board doors on opposite sides of the house. At the time she went to bed, both of the doors were closed, the one by a chair set against it, and the other (nearest to which she and the deceased slept) by a trundle bed and bedstead in which two of her other children slept. Between 8 and 9 o'clock, the witness was awakened by the discharge of a gun, and immediately called to her husband and enquired if he did not hear the firing, saying, she believed they were about to be murdered; to which he made no reply, but made a moaning noise as if awakening from a dream, and turned in the bed nearly upon his face. In placing her hand on his body and shaking him in order to arouse him, she felt blood, and getting immediately out of the bed, and going to the head of it, she saw that her husband was dead. He did not live more than a minute after her awakening. Immediately upon her awakening, she heard the report of three, four or five guns, as she supposed, in quick succession, as in counting one, two, three, fired on the outside of the house, and near to and around it. There was then a pause for a short time, about sufficient to enable the parties to reload their guns, when there was another firing of *four or five guns in quick succession as before. After a second pause of about the same length of time, three other guns were fired, at a somewhat greater distance from the house; and in a few moments thereafter a single gun was fired, at the distance, as witness supposed, of about one hundred yards from the house, being more remote than either of the previous firings; which last report was accompanied by the scream or yell of a man, which the witness then believed and now believes to have been the voice of Daniel F. M'Cune (one of the parties jointly indicted with the prisoner, and whose trial and conviction had preceded the present trial). The witness had on several other occasions (logrollings &c.) heard the yell of the said M'Cune, and thought she could distinguish it from that of any other person: but in the sounds heard by her, there were no words articulated, it being a single halloo or yell. The door which had been closed with the chair was at that time standing open about wide enough to admit a man's body. When it was closed, there were open cracks or joints in the clap-boards, sufficient to admit of seeing into the room from the outside; and the house was an open one, owing to the chinking being loose or having dropped out. When the witness awakened, the fire was still burning briskly.

It was further proved that the death of the deceased was occasioned by a leaden bullet, which entered his body about half an inch above the left nipple, and in its course destroyed the large arteries leading from the heart to the upper extremities, and after its force was spent, was lodged near the right shoulderblade, about three fourths of an inch from the surface of the right side. That the bullet, before striking and penetrating the body of the deceased, passed through the clapboard door nearest to the bed on which the deceased lay, about three eighths of an inch thick, 779 over the bodies of the witness and her child, and through a calico quilt *and light feather bed used as a covering, an oblique direction, carrying a portion of the feathers into the cavity of the body. From the position of the ground, the bullet hole in the door, and the direction in which the ball passed through said covering into the body of the deceased, it must have been discharged from a gun aimed from a piece of ground on the outside of the house, elevated from seven to nine feet above the floor, and about ten steps from the door aforesaid.

It was further proved on behalf the commonwealth, that on the afternoon of the 8th of April, about one hour and a half before sunset, William Turner and Jackson Cottrell, parties jointly indicted with the prisoner, were at the residence of Anthony Parsons, the father of the prisoner and with whom he lives, distant about two miles from the house of the deceased Jonathan Nichols. That the said Cottrell and Turner each had their guns with them, the latter having the gun which was produced in court on the trial, and which will be hereafter mentioned. That the witness (who was a neighbouring man) was at the same time at the house of Anthony Parsons on a visit, and also had with him his own gun; and on a conversation arising between the witness and the prisoner about an exchange of guns, the prisoner went into the house and brought his gun out. That between sunset and dark of the same evening, the aforesaid Daniel F. M'Cune and Jackson Cottrell were together at the house of John Connelly, about a quarter of a mile from the house of said Anthony Parsons; each of them having a gun, and Cottrell a pistol in addition. That they left said Connelly's before dark, and went in the direction of A. Parsons's. That the said Daniel F. M'Cune was the brother in law of the said Anthony Parsons, and the uncle of Jackson Cottrell and the prisoner: that the said Jackson Cottrell was the grandson of the said Anthony Parsons: and that the said was also proved, that in the neighbourhood where the transaction in question occurred, which is a remote and thinly settled part of the county of Kanawha, on the west fork of the Little Kanawha river, and some sixty miles from the court house of said county, it is the general custom of the inhabitants, when going about the neighborhood from house to house, to travel on foot and to carry their guns with them. It was further proved on the part of the commonwealth, that on the night of the 8th of April, about nine o'clock, some five young persons, males and females, in making a visit through the neighbourhood, called at the house of the said Anthony Parsons, where they remained about the space of ten minutes. That they did not see there either the prisoner, or either of the parties jointly indicted with him; and the witnesses (the young persons aforesaid) were satisfied that neither of said persons (the prisoners) was in the house when they were there. There were two beds on bedsteads in the house, (which was a small one, about 16 feet square) in one of which they saw Anthony Parsons and his wife; the other was unoccupied. There was a pallet on the floor, in which two or three of the prisoner's children were asleep. The prisoner's wife was out of bed, standing by the fire, with her clothes partly off and the remainder loose upon her, as if she was either preparing to go to bed, or had just risen from it. That the same party of young persons went directly from said Anthony Parsons's to the house of said William Turner, which is about 300 yards from the house of said Anthony Parsons: that a woman and her little girl, the only persons who lived with said Turner, had gone to bed, but said Turner was not there. That they (the young people aforesaid) extended their visit up the creek, about a mile and a half above said Turner's, to one Jacob Berkheimer's, who also was not at home at the time of their visit. That as 781 the same party of young people were *returning from their visit that night between 11 and 12 o'clock, the aforesaid Jackson Cottrell and William Turner overtook them: Turner then had a rifle gun, but Cottrell had no gun. The party proceeded together to Turner's house, where the witnesses (the young persons aforesaid) remained with Cottrell and Turner from one hour and a half to two hours, during which time a pistol was seen in the possession of said Cottrell. The witnesses then left said Turner and Cottrell together at the house of the former, and returned home about one o'clock.

It was further proved, that on the morning after the death of said Nichols (being Sunday), a number of the neighbours being assembled at the house of the deceased, much search was made for tracks and other signs of the persons who might have been present at the house on the preceding night. That no bullet hole or other mark of shooting was discovered, except the bullet hole through one door aforesaid: but on and about the piece of elevated ground near the house, before mentioned, and from which the gun is supposed to have been fired, foot prints were discovered, but not sufficiently distinct to enable them to determine what number of persons had been there, or to ascertain any thing as to the size or covering of the feet. That beyond the enclosure of the house, and some two yards from it, appearances of footprints in the woods were found leading in a direction from the premises, but not so distinct as to enable the witness to trace or follow them; but on approaching the creek, tracks were discovered crossing a small sandbar, and as the witness thought, of four persons walking abreast; two of which were of feet covered with moccasins, and the other two with square toed shoes. That the said tracks were measured by the witness, and the length thereof taken on a stick, which stick he afterwards gave to the widow of 782 the deceased, by whom it was lost or mislaid. The said *stick was never applied to the feet of the prisoner, or to those of either of the persons jointly indicted with him. That the first time the prisoner and the persons indicted with him were thereafter seen, the prisoner and the said Daniel F. M'Cune had on moccasins, and the said Turner and Cottrell had on squaretoed shoes. From mere observation of the feet of the prisoner and of the persons indicted with him, but without measurement, the witness who took the measure of the tracks was of opinion that the size of said tracks would correspond with the feet of the parties so jointly indicted. It was also proved, that in the neighbourhood of the occurrence, the use of moccasins by the male inhabitants was general and common, and that, of the shoes worn in the same neighbourhood, those of the squaretoed form were as common as any other. That early on sunday morning after the death of the deceased, and before the tracks on the sandbar were examined by the witness, it had snowed for a short time with violence, which snow did not lie on the ground for any length of time, but melted nearly as fast as it fell: that some rain also fell, accompanied by hail of considerable size, which continued for a very short time, but fell rapidly while it did continue.

It was further proved on the part of the commonwealth, that on the sunday after the death of the deceased, about 9 or 10 o'clock in the forenoon, some five or six persons on horseback passed up the creek, with a view to give intelligence to the neighbourhood of what had happened. That on approaching the house of Thomas Cottrell (the father of Jackson Cottrell) who was the uppermost settler on said creek, and lived about four miles from the house of the deceased, the said William Turner was seen standing in the door of said Cottrell's house. He immediately withdrew from the door, went into the house, and quickly returned accompanied 783 by the prisoner and the said Jackson Cottrell *(who lived there with his father). Turner and the prisoner had their guns in their hands; Cottrell had no gun, nor any other weapon. Upon being informed of the death of Nichols, the prisoner (in the language of witness) "appeared astonished at the news;" Turner whistled and seemed indifferent; while Jackson Cottrell said nothing. Upon being asked by the witness to go down to the house of the deceased, the prisoner declined doing so, saying that he was going to another neighbour's house to pay for some flaxseed. On the same day (sunday after the death of Nichols), Daniel F. M'Cune and William Turner came together to the house of the deceased. The prisoner came also a short time afterwards. There was at that time a considerable number of persons collected at the house of Nichols, and the corpse was lying on the bed in the same position, not having been moved except for the purpose of looking at the wound. When the prisoner came into the house, he asked, "Where is the dead man?" to which the witness replied, "There he lies." As the prisoner came into the room, he put his hand upon the wall, apparently for the purpose of steadying himself, and observed that "people had better be praying, than doing the like of this." Several of the witnesses for the commonwealth were also asked by her attorney to describe the appearance of the prisoner and M'Cune and Turner at that time. Some of the witnesses in reply said, that the prisoner looked whiter in the face that day than common; another, that he looked confused, and that his countenance indicated alarm; another, that he looked distressed in mind, was pale and red alternately, and that occasionally there was a twitching or quivering in the muscles about the chin. They also stated that Turner trembled, as did likewise M'Cune in a greater degree; that the last-mentioned, standing by and leaning 784 against the fence in the yard, *shook all over, and with so much violence that he shook the fence.

It was also proved, that in the afternoon of the same day (sunday the 9th) the said Daniel F. M'Cune was seen some two or three miles from the house of Nichols, travelling in a direction towards his home, with his rifle gun in his possession, which, as above stated, the said William Turner had in his possession at the house of Anthony Parsons on the evening of saturday the 8th, being the same gun which was produced in court on the trial of this indictment.

It was also proved by the coroner who held the inquest over the body of the deceased, that the rifle gun produced on the trial of this cause was sent for by him while engaged in taking the inquest; the place where the gun, and the bullet moulds belonging to it, (which were also produced on this trial) were to be found, having been first stated and pointed out to him by Daniel F. M'Cune. That the gun and bullet moulds now in court were accordingly, and in a short time, produced before him. That the moulds belonging to said gun ran bullets weighing from 55 to 60 to the pound; and the bullet extracted from the body of the deceased, upon being placed in a pair of small medicine scales against one of the bullets run in the said moulds, weighed within from two to five grains of the same weight with the latter. The witness who extracted the bullet from the body of the deceased, and weighed and compared it as aforesaid, supposed that its loss of weight by passing through the door and other substances before mentioned, before its force was spent, would be equivalent to the difference aforesaid. It was further proved, that some five or six years ago, guns of as large calibre as the gun aforesaid produced in court on the trial of the prisoner, were common in the neighbourhood of the deceased, but are 785 not so common *latterly, smaller guns being now more generally used.

It was also proved on the part of the commonwealth, that on the afternoon of Sunday the 9th of April, and after the prisoner and others indicted with him had been at the house of the deceased as aforesaid, the prisoner, Daniel F. M'Cune and William Turner were together in the yard of Anthony Parsons (with whom the prisoner resided as aforesaid). The said M'Cune stated to the said Turner, that from what he (M'Cune) could learn down at Nichols's, he (Turner) was suspected of having committed the murder; and that he (M'Cune) would advise him to leave. Whereupon the prisoner also remarked to Turner, that if he (the prisoner) were in Turner's place, he would be off. To which Turner replied, "Well, I have nothing to keep me here any longer;" but did not deny or admit the charge thus stated to have been made against him. This conversation was held in the presence of the witness who delivered it in court upon the present trial, without any apparent wish of the parties to conceal the same. It was further proved, that Turner left the neighbourhood the next morning, and was not arrested until some days after the prisoner, M'Cune and Cottrell were apprehended and sent to the county jail.

The commonwealth also gave evidence tending to prove a previous state of ill blood on the part of the prisoner towards the deceased, as follows, to wit:

That about a year ago, the witness thought in May, the prisoner was at the house of the witness, when the witness said to him, he had understood that the Nichols's had run him (the prisoner). The prisoner replied, No, they had tried to do it, but he had run them with a loaded gun. Prisoner also said, he would kill Jonathan and Zephaniah Nichols for it yet, if they did not watch. The witness lives in the neighbourhood of the prisoner, about two miles 786 off; has been in the habit *of frequently seeing the prisoner, at his own house and the house of the witness, at logrollings, houseraisings &c. but never heard him in any other wise threaten the deceased than as above. When he had the conversation above stated, he seemed to be in a good humour, and it did not make any impression on the mind of the witness. Witness has never spoken of it until since the death of Nichols. He has seen the prisoner and the deceased in company since the conversation aforesaid, and they appeared friendly.

Another witness proved, that in April 1842, on Easter day, he met with the prisoner, who complained to him of the Nichols's. He said that Zephaniah Nichols, a brother of the deceased, jumped out from behind a tree with a handspike as the prisoner was passing along, and that he (the prisoner) ran him with his gun for a short distance, when Jonathan Nichols (the deceased) and Robert Nichols (another brother) came to the assistance of Zephaniah, and the prisoner in turn gave way and ran. The prisoner at the same time applied to the witness, who was a justice of the peace, for a warrant against the said Nichols's; but the witness, being in the act of removing to an adjoining county, declined issuing such warrant: whereupon the prisoner said, he would then take his gun and run them out of the neighbourhood; that they were bad and troublesome people; that he had no fears of them personally, but was afraid they would do him some private mischief.

Another witness proved, that he was at work at Anthony Parsons's (the father of the prisoner) last hay harvest (1842), when the prisoner and his father and mother were talking about the Nichols's. One of the party stated, that some time previous, some one had stolen some meat from their smokehouse; that the mother of the prisoner, being about the door or yard at the time, was hit on the heel by one of the party stealing the meat; that she had 787 *in the house, who came out with his gun; but that they had made their escape. In the said conversation the prisoner remarked, that if he could have got at them, they would not have got off so easily. He said also, it must have been the Nichols's, as he did not know any body else likely to have done it. Witness then said to the prisoner, "There is law for such men, why don't you take the law on them?" to which the prisoner replied, No, he would take an easier plan for it than that; but did not say what plan, or any thing further.

Another witness proved, that the prisoner was at his house about a year ago, and was telling him of some of the Nichols's clubbing him. But Jonathan Nichols (the deceased) was not connected with the affair in that conversation.

It was also proved, that in January last the deceased, who was overseer of the road in his neighbourhood, had called the hands out to work the same. Some altercation took place as to the location of the road at or near the house of Anthony Parsons, the father of the prisoner; in which, however, the deceased took no part. Words passed between Zephaniah Nichols (brother of the deceased) and Anthony Parsons, who, it was proved, was an elderly man and blind. The said Zephaniah threw three sticks or clubs at old Anthony Parsons, when some one of the company advised the prisoner to go and take his father in; and he did go in the direction of said Anthony Parsons, and accompanied him to the house. The prisoner seemed disinclined to work on the road, and did little or no work that day. The deceased, as overseer, about the time of the altercation before mentioned, ordered the men to go to work; when the prisoner replied, "Go to hell!" or "Who the hell are you?" (Stated in both forms by two witnesses for the commonwealth.) Whereupon the deceased told the prisoner he was dismissed from the road, and that he would make him pay for that day's work, and his conduct *on the road; to which last remark the prisoner replied, that "he would pay it in hell," or that "he would pay it after he was in hell." (Stated in both forms by two of the witnesses.) A third witness, who testified to the same occurrence and conversation on the road, represented the prisoner as saying that he (the prisoner) "would pay it when Nichols was landed in hell." The last mentioned witness, after giving his account of the occurrence and altercation on the road, and being asked by the attorney for the commonwealth whether he knew any thing more, said, that "it ran in his head that the prisoner also observed on that occasion, that he would see blood that day." This witness also said, that the occurrence testified to by himself and the two other witnesses last mentioned took place last fall, instead of January as stated by them. He also, in reply to interrogatories of the prisoner's counsel, stated that he did not know on what day or month new year came, on what day of the month or year christmas came, did not know the number of days or weeks in the year, or how often the moon changed.

It was also proved, that the deceased lived on a small creek, a branch of the west fork of Little Kanawha river: that from the mouth of said creek to the uppermost settler thereon is about nine miles: and that, exclusive of the deceased and two of his brothers, who lived about a quarter of a mile from him, the only male adults who at the time of the death of said Nichols lived on said creek, were the following, namely, Edward Parsons, John Connelly, Thomas Cottrell the father of the said Jackson Cottrell, and his brother George Cottrell, Jacob Berkheimer, the said William Turner, and the prisoner and his father the said Anthony Parsons. It was further proved, that the deceased was a peaceable and orderly man in his neighbourhood, and that the prisoner had heretofore sustained a tolerable character in the same particulars. In the language of a witness, 789 *he was of average character with those in his neighbourhood. The attorney for the commonwealth having given the evidence hereinbefore stated, of this prisoner being in company with others of the prisoners as aforesaid, of his being absent from home as aforesaid, and that his father and mother resided in the same house with him and slept in the same room, the prisoner entirely omitted to give any evidence accounting for his absence from home on the night aforesaid, at what hour he returned, or with whom he had been out that night.

And this was all the evidence in the cause.

M'Cune, Cottrell and Parsons severally presented petitions to the general court, praying for writs of error to the judgments rendered against them respectively. The opinions of the circuit court declaring the competency of the several jurors Earle, Baber, Sisson, Bailey, Forqueran and Martin, were all complained of as erroneous; and Parsons complained also of the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict against him and award a new trial. On the question of competency of the jurors, Armistead's case, 11 Leigh 657, Oslander's case, 3 Leigh 780, and 3 Rob. Pract. 157-163, were cited and relied upon.

G. W. Summers, B. H. Smith, J. Hendrick and J. L. Carr, for each of the petitioners.

FIELD, J. (after stating the proceedings had against the petitioners respectively, and reciting the bills of exceptions relative to the several jurors aforesaid) delivered the opinion of the court as follows.

I. The opinion entertained by the juror William Earle, who was called upon the trial of M'Cune, had been formed from mere rumour. It was purely hypothetical.

790 And as he did not appear to be under the *influence of bias or prejudice either for or against the prisoner, the court is unanimously of the opinion that he was a good juror. The writ of error is therefore refused in M'Cune's case.

II. In relation to the three jurors Baber, Sisson and Bailey, called upon the trial of Cottrell, the judges present are also unanimously of opinion that they were competent. The opinions which they had formed were derived from mere rumour. They had not heard the evidence. And so far as the prisoner and the commonwealth were concerned, these men were free from partiality, bias or prejudice. There does not appear to be any error in the record of Cottrell's case, and the writ of error is consequently refused.

III. The court are likewise unanimous in the opinion that John Forqueran, called as a juror on the trial of Parsons, was competent.

It appears from the examination of Dioclesian Martin, called as a juror on the same trial, that his was an opinion upon mere rumour and neighbourhood reports, of the truth of which he had no knowledge. Towards the commonwealth and the prisoner he occupied an impartial position, and was not likely to be influenced in his verdict by prejudice. The opinion was clearly a hypothetical one, and this court is unanimously of the opinion that he was a good juror.

As to the question of a new trial, that depended on the evidence before the jury. That evidence was entirely circumstantial. Whether the circumstances were sufficient to establish the guilt of the prisoner, or not, it was the province of the jury to decide. The jury was satisfied that they were sufficient, and convicted the prisoner. With this verdict the judge before whom the trial took place, and who heard all the evidence, has indicated his satisfaction, by overrul-ing the prisoner's motion for a new trial. Where the finding of the jury is clearly against the evidence, or clearly without *evidence to justify it, it is the duty to the court to set the verdict aside upon the application of the prisoner, and to grant him a new trial. The circumstantial evidence in this case, which has been set forth in the bill of exceptions, has been examined by this court, and although we do not regard it as amounting to very strong and clear proof, yet a large majority of the court are of the opinion that this court cannot with propriety disturb the verdict and judgment on that ground. From this opinion, however, judges Lomax and Gholson dissent. They regard the testimony as clearly insufficient to establish the guilt of the prisoner, and would be willing to award the writ of error on that ground only.

In each case, writ of error denied.

Campbell and Others v. The Commonwealth.

June, 1843.

Criminal Law—Trespass—Construction of Statute*—

Case at Bar.—A party in actual and peaceable possession of land, which he claims as his own, encloses it with a fence. About four years afterwards another person, who claims the same land and has a better title to it, forcibly pulls down and removes the fence. HELD, this is not a trespass for which a prosecution can be sustained under the statute of February 14, 1823, Acts of 1822-3, ch. 34, § 1.

An indictment for wilful trespass, containing two counts, was found against David C. Campbell, Elisha Hobbs and Alexander Smyth, in the circuit court of Lee county at April term 1842. The first count charged that the defendants, on the 31st of March 1842, at the said county, "did unlawfully and maliciously, and without lawful authority, pull down, injure and destroy a certain fence then and there being on the land of John G. *King in the said county, against the form of the statute" &c. The second count charged that the said defendants, on &c. at &c. "did knowingly and wilfully, without lawful authority, but not feloniously, take and carry away a certain other fence then and there being on the land of John G. King in the said county, against the form of the statute" &c.†

For the proposition that the statute of February 14, 1823, has been uniformly construed to be a statute against wilful trespass, the principal case is cited in State v. Porter, 25 W. Va. 660. See Israel's Case, 4 Leigh 675; Dye's Case, 7 Gratt. 662.

†The indictment was framed upon the statute of February 14, 1823, (Acts of 1822-3, p. 36, ch. 34, § 1; Supp. to R. C. p. 280, ch. 226,) which enacts, "that any person who shall knowingly and wilfully, without lawful authority, cut down any tree growing on the land of another, or destroy or injure any such

The defendants pleaded not guilty. Upon the trial, a patent to John G. King, dated in 1822, and embracing the land in question, was introduced on the part of the commonwealth. The prosecutor further gave evidence, that 18 or 20 years ago, a certain James Campbell, claiming that King's patent interfered for a few acres at one corner with his (Campbell's) land, went upon the disputed part, built a cabin on it, and lived there for some time. That King, in October 1824, brought his complaint of forcible entry and detainer against Campbell, upon which, during the same month, a verdict was found for King, but in consequence of an informality in the finding, judgment was rendered in favour of Campbell: whereupon King threatened suit by writ of right; to prevent which, Campbell, before leaving the courthouse, agreed to surrender possession to King, and did shortly afterwards surrender it, and King had ever since held peaceable possession, until the commission of the trespass now complained of. That about 793 *4 years ago, King fenced the disputed land, and cleared and cultivated part of it; 3 or 4 years after which, the defendants went upon the land and tore down and removed the fence, in opposition to the remonstrances of King. Shortly afterwards, this indictment was found against them.

On the part of the defendants, evidence was adduced for the purpose of shewing that the said James Campbell, under whose authority and direction the alleged trespass was committed, had title to the land older and better than that of King. Campbell himself was examined as a witness. He claimed, under various deeds which he produced, 500 acres of land, parcel of a tract of 920 acres alleged to have been granted by the commonwealth to W. Anderson; but no patent was produced, nor were the deeds aforesaid in any way connected with such patent; and one of them purported to have been made by the widow and executor of a decedent, without authority from him to convey. Neither was it shewn that any of those deeds conveyed the land on which the trespass was alleged to have been committed.

After the evidence was closed, the attorney for the commonwealth moved the court to instruct the jury as follows: "If the jury shall believe from the evidence, that, at the time of the commission of the trespass charged in the indictment, John G. King was in actual peaceable possession of the land inclosed by the fence in the indictment tree, or any building, fence or other improvement, or the soil or growing crop on the land of another; or shall knowingly and wilfully, without lawful authority, but not feloniously, take and carry away, or destroy or injure any tree already cut, or any other timber or property real or personal belonging to another,"—"shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour, and may be prosecuted and punished as in other cases of misdemeanour at the common law."—Note in Original Edition.

mentioned, under a claim of right thereto, and had built said fence, and held such possession for about four years prior to the said trespass; then, although James Campbell, who had employed the defendants to commit the act charged as a trespass in said indictment, may have had a better legal title to the land inclosed as aforesaid than the said King, the defendants had no authority to enter forcibly upon the said land and pull down and remove said fence, and 794 *an entry by them for such purpose, under the authority of said Campbell, and the pulling down and removing said fence, if done by the defendants, amount to such an act of trespass as is sufficient to sustain this prosecution."

The court gave the instruction; being clearly of opinion that the same was correct in point of law, though entertaining some doubt whether the evidence in the case even tended to prove a title in Campbell superior to that of King, and so whether the instruction was not objectionable as presenting merely an abstract proposition.

To this instruction of the court, the defendants excepted.

The jury returned a verdict finding the defendants guilty, and assessing upon each of them a fine of 1 dollar 66 cents; and the court rendered judgment against them for the fines so assessed, and the costs of the prosecution.

On the petition of the defendants, the general court, at the last term, awarded a writ of error to the judgment.

H. S. Kane for the plaintiffs in error: the attorney general for the commonwealth.

The general court decided, "that the instruction which the circuit court gave to the jury upon the trial was incorrect, and ought not to have been given." Therefore, judgment reversed, verdict set aside, and cause remanded to circuit court for a new trial.

Grand Jury—Evidence of Proceedings before.—The principal case is cited in United States v. Farrington, 5 Fed. Rep. 347, to the point that generally the evidence of grand jurors is competent whenever it is necessary to ascertain what was the issue or what the testimony of witnesses before a grand jury in a given case.

mony) "which said evidence was wilfully false and corrupt, for in truth" &c. (falsifying the facts deposed to) "and so the defendant did, in manner and form aforesaid, commit wilful and corrupt perjury." On general demurrer to the indictment. HELD, here is no sufficient averment that the defendant wilfully or corruptly swore falsely, and the indictment is defective as well at common law as under the statute.

Solomon Thomas was indicted in the circuit superior court of law and chancery for Giles county, as far back as October term 1831, for perjury alleged to have been committed by him in giving evidence before a grand jury impaneled in the late superior court of law for the said county. The indictment set forth, that on the 19th of April 1830, a grand jury being sworn in the said superior court of law, diligently to enquire &c. (stating the oath in the terms prescribed by the statute) the said Solomon Thomas, after the grand jury were sworn, appeared in court and was desirous to go to the grand jury as a prosecutor, to give evidence of a breach of the peace alleged by him to have been committed by Isaac French in January 1830; and at his own instance he was sworn by the clerk of the court, by direction of the court, to give evidence to the grand jury: which said clerk, by direction of the court, had full power and authority to administer such oath. And then the indictment proceeded in the following words: "And the said Solomon Thomas, being sworn in manner and form aforesaid, did then and there go to the grand jury, and did depose and give evidence to the said grand jury in substance and to the effect following, to wit, that 796 Isaac French, at James French's infare, which *was in the month of January 1830, pushed on him the said Solomon Thomas for a fight, and struck him two or three times before he (Thomas) struck Isaac French, and that he (Thomas) was obliged to strike said French in order to defend himself, after having been struck by said Isaac French two or three times; which said evidence given to the said grand jury was wilfully false and corrupt, for in truth and in fact the said Isaac French, at the infare of James French in the month of January 1830, had not pushed on the said Solomon Thomas for a fight, and struck the said Solomon Thomas two or three times before the said Solomon Thomas struck the said Isaac French, but on the contrary the said Solomon Thomas struck the said Isaac French first, when the said Isaac French did not push on the said Thomas for a fight, and was not wanting to fight with the said Solomon Thomas: which said evidence given by the said Solomon Thomas to the said grand jury on the said 19th day of April 1830, was material in procuring the grand jury to find an indictment against the said Isaac French, for a breach of the peace, a true bill, and which the said grand jury, in consequence of the evidence of the said Solomon Thomas given to them, did find.

And so the grand jurors aforesaid do say that the said Solomon Thomas, on the said 19th day of April 1830, did, in manner and form aforesaid, commit wilful and corrupt perjury, against the form of the statute" &c.

Process to answer the indictment was from time to time awarded and ineffectually issued against the defendant, and the case regularly continued, until the year 1841. Being at length arrested, he was brought into court at October term 1841; when he demurred generally to the indictment, and the attorney for the commonwealth joined in the demurrer. The court, after argument of the demurrer, overruled the same, and the defendant thereupon pleaded not guilty to the indictment. A trial being had,

797 the jury found him *guilty, and assessed his fine to one dollar; and the court rendered judgment against him, for the said fine and the costs of the prosecution, and that he be imprisoned in the county jail for the term of one year without bail or mainprize.

Upon his petition, the general court, at December term 1841, awarded a writ of error to the judgment.

Standard for the plaintiff in error: the attorney general for the commonwealth.

FIELD, J., delivered the opinion of the court. This case has been argued upon a variety of questions that arise upon the record; but as the opinion of the court upon a single question is decisive of the cause, we deem it necessary to refer to so much only of the record as will be sufficient to shew the point upon which the decision is made.

The indictment, as to the perjury, is in the following words: [Here the judge recited the terms of the indictment as above set forth.] Upon the general demurrer, all defects in the indictment, both as to form and substance, were put in issue. Commonwealth v. Jackson, 2 Va. Cas. 501. Whether we regard the indictment in this case as an indictment for perjury at common law, or for perjury under the virginian statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 148, § 1, p. 571, we are unanimously of opinion that it is defective, in not setting forth the crime of perjury with sufficient direct and positive averments. An indictment upon the statute should aver that the defendant did "wilfully, corruptly and falsely" swear or affirm, as the case may be. An indictment at common law need not contain these words; but if they are omitted, such other words should be used in lieu of them, as will serve to shew the criminal intent, give to the indictment a precise and sufficient certainty, and apprise the defendant of the distinct charge made against him.

798 *In all indictments, the offence charged should be averred distinctly and directly, and not by way of intendment or argument. In this case the indictment, after setting out the evidence given, charges that the "said evidence was wilfully false and corrupt:" but nowhere does it directly charge that the accused wilfully and corruptly swore falsely. We regard the averment (if averment it be) that the "evidence was wilfully false and corrupt," at most as charging the corrupt oath by argument only, and not directly.

Judgment of circuit court reversed, and judgment entered sustaining the demurrer, and discharging the plaintiff in error from the indictment.

(Note by reporter.) It has been held in Pennsylvania, that it is not indispensable, in mentioning the act of swearing, to state that the defendant did falsely, corruptly and voluntarily swear, in order to constitute the offence of perjury at common law. The allegation that the defendant did voluntarily and of his own free will and accord propose to the court to purge himself of the contempt alleged against him; and then (after stating the oath, the matter deposed to, and wherein it was false) the concluding averment that so the defendant, by his own act and consent, and of his own most wicked and corrupt mind and disposition, in manner aforesaid did knowingly, falsely, wickedly, maliciously, wilfully and corruptly commit wilful and corrupt perjury,—did, it was considered, sufficiently assert and charge against the defendant the wilfulness, absoluteness, falsity and malice of the oath. Respublica v. Newell, 8 Yeates 407.

In Cox's case, 1 Leach's C. L. 71, an indictment at common law, which charged that the defendant "falsely, maliciously, wickedly and corruptly swore," &c. was holden sufficiently to imply that the offence was committed wilfully: but it was considered at the same time, that in an indictment on the statute 5 Eliz. ch. 9, the offence must be expressly laid to have been wilfully committed.

In The king v. Richards, 7 Dowl. & Ry. 685, 16 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 814, the indictment charged that the defendant was duly sworn as a witness on the trial of I. H. "and then and there falsely and maliciously gave false testimony against the said I. H." &c. "by then and there falsely deposing and giving in 799 evidence" *&c. and so the said defendant "did in manner and form aforesaid commit wilful and corrupt perjury." The case coming before the court of king's bench on a rule nisi for arresting the judgment, Abbott, C. J., said—"I am of opinion that the rule must be made absolute. As to the first four counts, the objection is, that they do not charge that the defendant swore wilfully and corruptly, but merely that he swore falsely and maliciously. Now, according to every definition, the offence of perjury consists in swearing to some matter which is untrue, wilfully and corruptly. Whether the word maliciously may supply the place of one or other of these words, it is not necessary, in the present case, expressly to decide, because this indictment contains neither; but the case of Rex v. Cox, Leach's Cr. Ca. 71, is an express authority to shew, that without one or the other, an indictment for perjury cannot be sustained. It still remains a question, whether the use of one, in the absence of the other, would be sufficient." The other judges present (Bayley and Littledale) concurred. The case of The king v. Stephens, 5 Barn. & Cress. 246, 11 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 216, decided by the court of king's bench at the same time with Richard's case, is in all respects similar to it.

Wright v. Same.

Gaming—Construction of Statute.*—The statute of March 26, 1842, (Acts of 1841-2, ch. 69, § 4, p. 44.) enacting "that in all recoveries hereafter had for violations of the gaming laws, the fee recovered shall be ten dollars for the commonwealth's attorney, and the sum of thirty dollars shall be paid to the literary fund in lieu of the sum as at present provided," had no application whatever to offences committed before its passage, but such offences remained liable to prosecution and punishment under the preexisting law, in the same manner as if the said statute had never been passed.

Same—Process—Capias—Reversal of Judgment.—A party being indicted for playing at an unlawful game, the court immediately awards a capias against him, returnable the next day; at the return day, he moves to quash the capias as improper process, which motion the court overrules, and compels him to plead forthwith: HELD, the irregularity (if any) in this proceeding is no sufficient ground to reverse judgment against the defendant.

John W. Pitman was indicted in the court of hustings for the town of Fredericksburg, on the 13th of May 1842, for unlawful gaming by playing at cards at the Eagle tavern, a place of public resort in said corporation, within six months then last past. On the 15th of July 1842, the defendant, having been duly summoned to answer the indictment, appeared and pleaded not guilty; and a trial being thereupon had, the jury found him guilty in manner and form as in the indictment alleged, and the court rendered judgment against him for a fine of 20 dollars and the costs of the prosecution. By a bill of exceptions filed by the defendant, it appeared, that on the trial of the issue, the commonwealth proved that the said defendant, within six months before the finding of the indictment, and prior to the first of March 1842, did game by playing at a game played with cards, at the Eagle tavern, a place of public resort in Fredericksburg; which being all the facts

801 proved on the *trial, the defendant, after the verdict was rendered, moved the court to set it aside and grant him a new trial, upon the ground that the said verdict was against the law and the evidence of the case; and this motion being overruled by the court, he excepted to its opinion. To the judgment of the court of hustings a writ of error was awarded by the judge of the circuit superior court of Spotsylvania, upon a petition of the defendant, in which he insisted that the act of March 26, 1842, (Acts of 1841-2, ch. 69, § 4, p. 44.) enacting "that in all recoveries hereafter had for violations of the gaming laws, the fee recovered shall be ten dollars for the commonwealth's attorney, and the sum of thirty dollars shall be paid to the literary fund in lieu of the sum as at present provided," had the effect to repeal the preexisting statute for punishing this class of offences; and as it contained no provision for the prosecution of offences committed before its passage, and the only act of gaming proved against this defendant was committed before that date, this prosecution could not be sustained, and consequently the court of hustings erred in overruling the motion for a new trial. The cause was heard in the circuit court of Spotsylvania at October term 1842; when that court was of opinion, that the statute of March 26, 1842 did not operate to discharge the punishment of offences committed prior to its passage, but that the court of hustings nevertheless erred in giving judgment for the sum of 20 dollars fine, instead of 30 dollars. The circuit court, therefore, proceeding to give such judgment as the court of hustings ought to have given, considered that the plaintiff in error, for the offence alleged against him in the indictment, forfeit and pay to the commonwealth 30 dollars, and that he pay the costs of the prosecution in the said court of hustings, including a fee of ten dollars to the attorney for the commonwealth, and also the costs expended about the defence in the circuit court.

802 *Thomas Wright was also indicted in the said court of hustings, on the same 13th of May 1842, for unlawful gaming by playing at cards at the tavern of R. L. Blackburn, a place of public resort in said corporation, within six months then last past. On the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, the court, immediately upon the finding of the indictment, awarded a writ of capias against the defendant, returnable the next day. On the return day (the 14th) the defendant moved the court to quash the capias, as irregular and improper process; but the court overruled the motion, and required him to plead forthwith to the indictment; to which opinion and decision of the court he excepted. He thereupon pleaded not guilty, and a jury was impaneled for his trial. At the trial, the commonwealth having offered in evidence the testimony of a witness, who deposed that in December 1841 the defendant played a game with cards at R. L. Blackburn's tavern, a place of public resort in Fredericksburg, and this being all the evidence offered on the part of the commonwealth, the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that, upon the evidence aforesaid, the prosecution in this case could not be maintained, and that the jury ought to find a verdict for the defendant. The court refused to give such instruction, and the defendant excepted to its opinion. The jury having found him guilty in manner and form as alleged in the indictment, the court rendered judgment against him for a fine of thirty dollars, and the costs of the prosecution. He then applied to the circuit court of Spotsylvania for a writ of error; alleging in his petition (among other objections which it is unnecessary to notice), 1. that the writ of capias was not the proper process upon the indictment, but unlawful, injurious and oppressive, and the court of hustings erred in overruling the motion to quash the same; 2. that this prosecution, being instituted since the pas-

803 sage of the act of March 26, 1842, for an offence *committed before, could not be maintained; 3. that even if the prosecution could be maintained, yet the judgment was wrong in imposing a fine of thirty dollars, instead of twenty. The circuit court awarded the writ of error; but afterwards, at October term 1842, upon the hearing of the cause, affirmed the judgment of the court of hustings, with costs.

On the several petitions of Pitman and Wright, the general court, at December term 1842, awarded writs of error to the judgments of the circuit court against them respectively. Both of them, in their petitions, relied upon the act of March 26, 1842, as operating to discharge them from prosecution: and Wright also insisted that the issuing of the capias against him, and the refusal of the court to quash it, were erroneous.

The cases were argued by Morson, Seddon and Archer for the plaintiffs in error, and by the attorney general for the commonwealth.

FRY, J., delivered the opinion of the majority of the court.—These cases present judgments under the gaming laws, for the offences committed before the passage of the act of March 26, 1842.

It is contended that the judgments are erroneous, because the laws existing previous to the said act were repealed by it, and of consequence all previous offences were thereby remitted or discharged.

The question depends, therefore, on the true construction of the act of the 26th of March 1842. The act is in these words: "That in all recoveries hereafter had for violations of the gaming laws, the fee recovered shall be ten dollars for the commonwealth's attorney, and the sum of thirty dollars shall be paid to the literary fund in lieu of the sum as at present provided."

804 *These are brief words, and, we must confess, not free from difficulty. What construction shall we give them? Do they repeal the previous offences?

There is no repealing clause; and the words do not import any repeal. So far from it, they imply the continuance of the previous laws. "In all recoveries hereafter had for violations of the gaming laws" &c. What recoveries can be had, or violations occur, under laws that have no existence? The act manifestly contemplates that the previous laws shall continue in force, and recoveries continue to be had under them.

It is said, however, that though there is no express repeal of the previous laws, there is an implied one: that the act prescribes a new punishment for past offences,—an aggravated punishment,—by increasing the fine from twenty to thirty dollars: that it is inconsistent with the former laws, and, being the last expression of the legislative will, must abrogate them, upon the principle, leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant.

The authorities cited at the bar shew, that implied repeals are not favoured; that two affirmative statutes shall coexist if they can, and this notwithstanding the use of general words, whose grammatical construction might imply the contrary. 6 Bac. Abr. 439.*

805 *Let us then enquire why we are obliged to imply a repeal of the previous laws, and discharge of previous offences? Did the legislature intend such repeal and discharge? For we admit that in this act, as in all others, we must enquire into the legislative intent, and give effect to it if we can.

Admitting, then, (though some of the judges deny it) that the act varied and increased the punishment prescribed by former laws, the question occurs, to what offences does it apply? Does it apply to violations committed before its passage, or only to those committed afterwards? If it applies only to offences committed after its passage, it does not conflict with the former law, and consequently both will stand. If it applies, or can be legally applied, to previous offences, then the conflict will arise, and the last law only will have effect.

Before pursuing this question, we advert to a few general rules of construction.

1. The laws against gaming are to be construed as remedial laws. 2. Such construction shall be made as will give effect to the legislative intent, and not defeat it. Magis valeat quam pereat. 3. The construction shall be, as nearly as possible, in conformity with the principles of the common law. 4. If it be possible, a reasonable construction shall be made, and a reasonable and lawful intent imputed, rather than one unreasonable and unlawful. 5. All laws are, or ought to be, prospective in their action. Retrospective laws are odious, and never presumed to be intended, unless

*Note by the judge. The statute of 29 Car. 2, ch. 8, enacted, "that from and after the 24th day of June 1677, no action shall be brought to charge any person upon any agreement made upon consideration of marriage, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought &c. shall be in writing and signed." After this statute, an action was brought upon a promise in consideration of marriage, not in writing, made before the act passed. Upon special verdict found, it was adjudged for the plaintiff. And by the court: "It cannot be presumed that the statute was to have a retrospect, so as to take away a right of action which the plaintiff was entitled to before the time of its commencement." Gilmore v. Shuter, 3 Lev. 297. And see Wader v. Arell, 2 Wash. 282; Wallace & ux. v. Talliaferro & ux., 2 Call 447; Elliott's ex'or v. Lyell, 3 Call 268; Commonwealth v. Hewitt, 2 Hen. & Munf. 181.

by inevitable construction. And ex post facto laws are void. 6. All laws in pari materia should be considered together.

Let us pursue the enquiry with the aid of these principles.

Does the law mean to embrace violations before its passage, and to vary and enlarge the punishment?

806 *To suppose that the legislature so intended is to suppose, first, that it intended what was unjust in design, and vain and idle in effect. It is to suppose the legislature intended what was wrong in itself, and what it had no power to inflict. Shall we impute his unrighteous and idle purpose to it? And to what end? In order that we may give effect to it? By no means—the plaintiffs in error contend not for that—but in order that we may both deny effect to this new purpose of the assembly, and, whilst we refuse to give it effect, make it abrogate the former law, which it was intended to supply: in other words, that we may make it something, and nothing; give it the power to kill, but only, like the insect, to lose its life in the wound. If the legislature intended to apply the law to former cases, then it cannot take effect; it is a dead letter. If such was not the legislative intent, the question is at an end. And in either case there is no conflict with the old law, and that law remains in full force.

Secondly, to apply the law to former cases makes it ex post facto. It imputes an unreasonable and unlawful purpose to the legislature. It defeats the purpose itself; or, worse than useless, as the plaintiffs contend, abolishes the former punishment, while it fails to inflict the new. It violates the principle that the laws should be prospective. It fails (contrary to the declaration that the laws shall be deemed remedial) to advance the remedy and suppress the mischief contemplated by the laws against gaming, by giving impunity to offenders against them.

For the foregoing reasons, we think the legislature did not intend to apply their enactment to previous offences; and if general words are used that admit of such construction, we are bound to limit their application, and to give them a reasonable and constitutional interpretation. We may even interpolate words for such purpose.

Abundant cases, we believe, may be 807 *found to this effect. (See cases cited in preceding note.) And to illustrate the subject by an example, suppose the legislature should enact “that in all convictions hereafter had for any violations of the laws against larceny, the party shall be hanged;” what construction would we give it? Would we not say it applied to future violations only, and was even so intended by the legislature, notwithstanding the general words used? And if we even supposed they intended to apply it to past offences, would we turn such abortive intent into an implied legislative pardon for all such offenders?

If we limit the act of March 26, 1842 to future offences, then it is to be construed as if it read thus—“That in all recoveries hereafter had for violations of the gaming laws hereafter committed,” &c. Supply these words, or apply the act to future offences only, and the cases before us fall precisely within the principle of Pegram's case, 1 Leigh 569. In 1825, Pegram had been presented for keeping a faro bank table. At this time, the offence was punishable by imprisonment in the common jail, and by stripes at the discretion of the court. By the act of 1827-8 it was enacted, that whoever should thereafter be guilty of any of the offences &c. should be punished by imprisonment and fine, &c.—changing the punishment. Pegram, who was not arrested until after this act went into effect, insisted that he was entitled to be discharged. But the court said: “In the case of Attoo v. The Commonwealth, 2 Virg. Ca. p. 382, it was decided, that where a new statute prescribes a new punishment for an offence which had been previously punishable otherwise, and the new statute repeals all laws which come within its purview, but does not provide that offences committed before the operation of the new law, shall be punished under the old, such repeal operates as a discharge of all such offenders.

But that case is very different from 808 *this. There the law repealed and annulled the punishment enacted before that time against the offenders: here the act of 1827-8 does not, either expressly or impliedly, repeal the previous punishment prescribed by the act of 1822-3, except in the case of future offences. There is no repealing clause in the act of 1827-8; and although the principle is correct that leges posteriores priores abrogant, yet they only abrogate them from the time that the latter law is passed, or goes into effect. The principle on which this rule prevails is, that the latter statute being incompatible with the former, they cannot exist together, and the latest expression of the will of the legislature is the law. But there is no incompatibility in the statutes now under consideration. A punishment affixed to an offence prior to the 1st May 1828, is not incompatible with a different punishment, either lighter or more severe, affixed to the same offence subsequent to that date. They may both well stand together.”

The reasoning in the above case of Pegram, under the construction which we give to the act of 1842, answers all the cases which have been cited before us on the effect of the repeal of statutes.

We think the conclusion we have come to, best effects the intention of the legislature. It puts a reasonable and just construction upon the act, by making it provide punishment for future cases only, without attempting to provide one for past offences. If the legislature intended to apply it to past offences, and to punish them higher than before, the attempt is abortive; and an abortive attempt to punish more severely, should not be converted into an implied or intended dispensation from all punishment whatsoever. We think that we best subserve the legislative intent to punish, by leaving in force the punishment lawfully inflicted, though we deny that unlawfully devised.

809 *The judges are not unanimous in this opinion. Some of them think that the court below committed no error, because the act does not vary or increase the punishment. Some of them are for reversing the judgments and discharging the offenders altogether: and one of them thinks that the act was intended to apply to former cases, but is void as to the fine, and can affect only the taxation of costs.

As to the question arising on the process in one of the cases, a majority of the judges think there is no error which should affect the judgment of the court. Some of the judges think it was competent to the court to award the process; some, that if any error was committed in that respect, it is not now material; while two of them think there was error in that respect, and that, for such error, the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a summons to issue, &c.

FIELD, J. I concur with the majority of the court in the judgment to be given; but as I take a view of the subject entirely different from that of the other judges, I will in a few words state my own reasons. In construing the laws of Virginia to suppress unlawful gaming, the statute requires that they should be construed remedially, so as to advance the object and intention of the legislature. The act of the 26th March 1842 was intended by the legislature to apply to all cases of unlawful gaming, in which the attorney's fee and fine together amounted to 40 dollars. It was not their intention to repeal any existing law, nor did they suppose that they were about to increase the penalty. Their idea was, that there would be an apportionment of the attorney's fee in part for the benefit of the commonwealth; that so far as the defendant was concerned, the amount to be paid by him being the same, the punishment by fine would be the same. But this

810 *view cannot be sustained. Costs and charges of prosecution are never regarded as a part of the penalty or punishment for the offence. The law of costs may at any time be changed and modified. Costs may be increased or diminished at the will and pleasure of the legislature, and applied to all prosecutions, whether they be for offences committed before or after the passage of the act. It was competent for the legislature, after the 26th of March 1842, to pass another law raising the attorney's fee to 20 dollars, 30 dollars, or any other sum that they might deem reasonable and proper. If such law had been passed, how would the act of the 26th March 1842, as to the 30 dollars for the commonwealth, be then regarded? Could it be then said that the penalty had not been increased? Whatever may have been the understanding of the legislature upon this point, it is very clear to my mind, that when they took 10 dollars from the attorney's fee and added it to the penalty, which was 20 dollars, they did thereby increase the penalty to 30 dollars. This law, therefore, so far as it was intended to apply to offences which had been committed before its passage, was void; and being void, it cannot have the effect of repealing by implication any previously existing law, with which it would have been in conflict if it had been a valid law. It is not in conflict with any law against unlawful gaming, as to offences theretofore committed, because it is void, and as a piece of blank paper. But as to offences committed after the passage of the act, it is in conflict with the old law, because it increases the penalty from 20 dollars to 30 dollars. From this view of the case it follows, that as to the offences of which the defendants have been convicted (both of which were committed before the 1st of March 1842), the old law was in force, and is yet in force, and judgments should be rendered against them for the fine of 20 dollars only, and costs. In 811 the taxation of costs, *the attorney's fee of 10 dollars only should be taxed. The law of the 26th March 1842, not being void in that respect, repeals the old law as to the attorney's fee, by implication.

As to the objection taken by Wright to the process, I do not regard that as a matter about which error can be assigned in this record, though I am clearly of opinion that the proper process was a summons, and not a capias. Upon habeas corpus, I would have discharged the defendant. But as it was competent for the court in such a case, by express law, to have issued the summons returnable instantly, and to give judgment instantly against the defendant if he failed to plead, it was certainly unnecessary to go through the ridiculous absurdity of issuing process to bring a man before the court, who was then there in his proper person, not as a casual bystander, but as a party to the record. Being then present judicially as party upon the record, the court might have quashed the capias, and at the same time made an order in his presence requiring him to plead forthwith; and, if he failed to plead, might have entered judgment against him according to law.

CHRISTIAN, J. I dissent entirely from the opinion and judgment pronounced in these cases by the majority of the court, and from the whole course of reasoning so ably and ingeniously urged in support of them. And so confident do I feel that the view I have taken of the law is the correct one, that nothing less than the great respect I entertain for the ability and legal learning of my brethren who differ with me, could induce me even to doubt. I beg leave to state, as briefly as I can, the grounds and reasons for my opinion. I regard these cases as important, not on account of the interest to the parties concerned, but as regards the principle which I consider involved in and settled by the judgment of the court.

812 *These cases depend upon the proper construction to be given to the act of the 26th March 1842. The defendants were indicted for offences against the gaming laws. These offences were committed prior to the passage of the act of 26th March 1842. At the time they were committed, the punishment for them was a pecuniary fine of 20 dollars. The act of 26th March 1842 is in these words: [Here the judge recited it.] Can any judgment for a fine be rendered against the defendants? and if any, what, and under what law? I maintain that no judgment can be rendered. None can be rendered for the fine of thirty dollars, as directed by the act of 26th March 1842, because that act, having passed since the offences were committed, is, as to all such cases, ex post facto, and hence to apply it to such cases would be contrary to the constitution. Nor can any judgment be rendered for the fine of twenty dollars; because the act in force at the time the offences were committed, which imposed the fine of twenty dollars, is repealed by the act of 26th March 1842. For although the act of March 1842 contains no clause of express repeal, it nevertheless operates an implied repeal of all previous laws relating to the same subject, so far as it conflicts or is inconsistent with them; the principle being, that where there are two inconsistent statutes upon the same subject, the last statute repeals the former by implication, to the extent of such inconsistency. If authority should be required to sustain a principle so obviously just and right, I refer to Dwarris on Statutes 672, 3; 6 Bac. Abr. 372, 3; 11 Rep. 63a.; 8 East 580; 4 Burr. 2026; Leach's Cr. Cas. 228.

The only remaining question, then, is whether the act of 26th March 1842 be inconsistent with the previous laws on the same subject. Can that act stand in harmony with the former statute, which for these offences imposed a fine of twenty dollars? I humbly insist, that so far from being harmonious, the two statutes are 813 directly *inconsistent and hostile.

The act of the 26th March is so short, so plain, so simple, so direct, and the meaning of the legislative body so obvious, that argument cannot render it more clear, nor can metaphysics obscure it. It declares that "in all recoveries hereafter had" &c. the fine imposed shall be thirty dollars, in lieu of the fine now imposed by law. These cases, it seems to my mind, are stated, argued, and concluded by answering two questions; 1st. when were the offences committed? and 2. when were the recoveries had? If the offences were committed before the act of March 1842, and the recoveries were after, the court can render no judgment for the fine. I have already shewn that where two statutes relating to the same subject are in hostility to each other, the last statute gives the law of the case, and, to the extent of the incompatibility, is regarded as impliedly repealing the first. So far as consequences are concerned, can it make any difference whether the repeal is express or implied? I apprehend not. I can see no difference on principle, and if there be any authority, I beg to see it; I have never seen or heard of such. To prove, then, that if there had been in the act of 26th March 1842 a clause repealing all acts coming within its purview, no judgment could have been rendered in these cases, I will refer to the following cases decided by the general court: Scutt's case, 2 Virg. Cas. 54; Attoo's case, 2 Virg. Cas. 382, and Leftwich's case, 5 Rand. 657,—in all and each of which the proposition is distinctly announced and clearly settled, that where a new statute prescribes a new punishment for an offence previously punishable otherwise, and the new statute repeals all laws coming within its purview, but does not provide that offences committed before the operation of the new law shall be punished under the old, such repeal operates as a discharge of all such offenders. In Leftwich's case, the defendant was indicted for marrying his deceased wife's sister. At the time

814 of *the offence committed, the punishment prescribed by statute was separation of the parties. Before the trial, the legislature, by a new act, provided a different punishment, to wit, fine and imprisonment; and the new act contained a clause of repeal of all acts within its purview. The general court unanimously decided that no judgment could be rendered, either under the old act or the new. Scutt's case is still stronger. The defendant was indicted for malicious stabbing; the act being charged and proved to have been committed on the 29th of March 1817, at which time such offences were punishable under the act of 1803. The trial was had on the 17th of April 1817. On the 20th of February 1817, the legislature passed another act upon the subject of stabbing, commencing from and after the first day of April 1817, which, however, provided the same punishment for malicious stabbing as was prescribed by the act of 1803. But the act of February 1817 contained a clause repealing all acts within its purview. The general court, with the able judge White at its head, unanimously decided that no judgment could be rendered against the accused. In Attoo's case, the accused, a free man of colour, was indicted on the 15th of September 1823, for forgery. The offences was charged and proved to have been committed on the 10th May 1823, at which time it was punishable under the act of 1819, by confinement in the penitentiary. By an act passed the 21st of February 1823, which went into operation after the offence was committed, but before the indictment and trial, the punishment for the offence was changed to sale and transportation, and the act contained a clause of repeal, without making any provision for the prosecution of offences before committed. The court unanimously decided that no judgment could be rendered against the accused, and that he be acquitted and discharged.

815 *But the majority of this court rely upon Pegram's case, 1 Leigh 569, as authority against the views I take of the cases at bar, and as answering all the cases which have been cited before us on the effect of the repeal of statutes. Pegram's case, properly understood, furnishes, as I humbly think, no authority whatever that militates against any principle for which I contend, or against any principle properly involved in the cases before us. What is that case? Pegram was indicted for keeping and exhibiting a faro bank table. The offence, at the time it was committed, was punishable under the act of 1822-3, by confinement in the common jail and by strike. Pegram was not arrested and put upon his trial until December 1829. In the mean time, to wit, at the session of 1827-8, the legislature passed an act in which they declared, that whoever should thereafter be guilty of the said offence, should be punished by confinement in the county jail, and by fine of not less than 200 nor more than 800 dollars. This act contained no repealing clause. Pegram insisted that the act of 1822-3, which was in operation at the time his offence was charged to have been committed, was repealed by the act of 1827-8, because the latter act prescribed a new punishment. But the court decided that the act of 1822-3 was not repealed by the act of 1827-8, either expressly or impliedly. And why did they so decide? Because the act of 1827-8, by its very letter, provided only for the case of those who should thereafter be guilty, leaving entirely intact the case of previous offenders. There was no express repeal, and no inconsistency to work an implied one. But suppose the legislature, instead of using the language "whoever shall hereafter be guilty" &c. had said that in all judgments hereafter rendered against any person found guilty of keeping and exhibiting a faro bank table, the sentence shall be that the accused be hanged, in lieu of the punishment now prescribed; the case would 816 be in principle precisely *like the cases at bar, and in such case, upon the authorities cited, no judgment could be rendered: not the judgment of hanging, because it would be ex post facto; and by the plain terms of the supposed act, no other judgment could be rendered.

The majority of the court have also relied upon a decision made in England upon the statute of 29 Car. 2, ch. 3. I have not examined that case, but I see enough in the statute itself to satisfy me that the decision ought not to be regarded as of any authority or weight in cases like those now before us. That statute is one affecting contracts. To give here to such an act a construction depriving the party of his remedy, would be plainly in violation of the constitution of the United States, which declares that "no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts." And in this the constitution but affirms that great principle of the common law, under the influence of which the court, in the case referred to, very properly decided as it did.

Much has been said about the intention of the legislature, and it is insisted by the majority of the court, that the legislature could never have intended that offenders such as Wright and Pitman should go unpunished. It is sufficient to reply, ita lex scripta est. Where the language of the legislature is neither equivocal nor ambiguous, but short, plain, simple and positive, we are bound to give effect to it according to the obvious meaning, without looking to the consequences. This is both the proper, and the only safe rule. If it be departed from, every thing is left in doubt and uncertainty; men are set to guessing at the legislative meaning, and we may have as many different interpretations of an act, as there are judges whose duty it is to expound it. Suppose that in the cases of Scutt, Attoo and Leftwich, heretofore cited, the general court had resorted to such a mode of ascertaining the intention of the legislature; all must see at 817 once that the judgment *in each of those cases must have been the reverse of what it was. For they must have known that it was not the intention of the legislature, in enacting the several laws under which those cases were decided, to pass acts of amnesty and pardon for all who had previously been guilty of similar crimes, though that was the consequence of the court's decision. It is the duty of the court to expound the statute as it is written, and if mischievous consequences follow, the fault is not theirs. The legislature will in all cases do as they have done in the present instance,—guard against the mischief by subsequent legislation. At the late session, they passed an act (Sess. Acts of 1842-3, p. 57, ch. 84), remedying, as far as practicable, the mischief resulting from the act of the 26th March 1842, and thereby giving to the last-mentioned act a legislative construction very different from that given by this court; plainly shewing that they themselves did not understand the act as this court construed it. And I maintain, that admitting the fact that some mischief, or even very great mischief, may sometimes result from adhering strictly to the rule which I insist is the true one, such mischief is only as dust in the balance, compared to the evil that may result from the adoption of the principle which I think involved in the judgment of the court in the cases before us,—a principle by which the citizen is to be held amenable to laws that are ex post facto, and which weakens, if it does not cut asunder, the tenure by which we hold our property, our liberties, and our very lives.

The majority of the court, speaking of the act of 26th March 1842, have said, "These are brief words, and not free from difficulty." I think that if the difficulty were such as to create even doubt in the mind of the court as to the true construction of the act, the decision should have been in favour of the defendants.

818 *Upon the other question, I concur with the majority of the court.

In the foregoing opinion, judges Brown and Clopton concur.

In Pitman's case, judgment of circuit court reversed, and that of the court of hustings affirmed, with costs to the commonwealth of her defence in the circuit court.

In Wright's case, judgment of circuit court reversed. "And this court proceeding to enter such judgment in the premises as the said circuit superior court ought to have rendered, it is farther considered that the said judgment of the court of hustings for the town of Fredericksburg be also reversed and annulled, and that the said Thomas Wright forfeit and pay to the commonwealth, instead of the fine of thirty dollars thereby imposed, a fine of twenty dollars only, and that he pay the costs of the prosecution in the said court of hustings, including a fee of twenty dollars to the attorney prosecuting in that court on behalf of the commonwealth."

The Commonwealth v. Hart.

December, 1843.

Criminal Law—Perjury—Witness—Competency—Case at Bar.—On the trial of an indictment for a perjury, the commonwealth offers as a witness a person against whom a civil action is pending, wherein the defendant in the indictment has been summoned as a witness for the opposite party: HELD, the witness so offered for the commonwealth has no such interest in the prosecution as renders him incompetent to testify.

In the circuit superior court of Harrison county, on the 20th of May 1842, an indictment was found against Josiah Hart for perjury, alleged to have been committed by him on the 11th of December 1841, in falsely swearing to a schedule then subscribed and delivered in by him as an insolvent debtor, under a ca. sa. issued on a judgment recovered against him by Burton Despard assignee of Henry Shue. The indictment was found upon the information of James Devers and Solomon Johnson, witnesses called on by the grand jury.

820 *The defendant having pleaded not guilty, and a jury being impaneled for his trial, the said James Devers was offered as a witness on the part of the prosecution, and was about to be examined, when he was objected to by the defendant on the ground of incompetency from interest. The evidence adduced in support of the objection disclosed the following state of facts.

The judgment and execution set out in the indictment had been transferred, prior to the defendant's taking the oath of insolvency as aforesaid, to the said James Devers, who was entitled to the benefit thereof at the time the oath of insolvency was taken. Devers subsequently sued out a writ of fieri facias upon the judgment, directed to the sheriff of Harrison, who levied the same upon certain chattels in the possession of Josiah Hart the defendant. This property being claimed by a certain John G. Hart, and a doubt thereupon arising as to the title, the sheriff required an indemnifying bond; which, on the 15th of February 1842, was accordingly given in the usual form, by James Devers with James Blair as his surety. The sheriff having thereupon proceeded to sell the property, an action was shortly afterwards instituted upon the indemnifying bond, at the relation and for the benefit of John G. Hart, against Devers and his surety. The declaration was filed at June rules 1842; the defendants pleaded to issue at October rules 1842; and the action was still pending and undetermined in October 1843, when Devers was offered as a witness for the commonwealth upon the trial of the said indictment. In the action on the indemnifying bond, the said Josiah Hart, who stood indicted as aforesaid, had been summoned as a witness for the plaintiff.

The question arising upon the motion of the prisoner to exclude the examination of the said Devers as a witness being considered by the circuit court to be new and difficult, by consent of the prisoner, 821 the court discharged *the jury impaneled in the case, and adjourned to this court the question, Whether the said James Devers is a competent witness on behalf of the prosecution?

FRY, J., delivered the opinion of the court.—The court deems it right to repeat what was said in Nix's case, 11 Leigh 636, that the practice of dismissing a jury to take the opinion of this court upon matters occurring in the course of a trial, is inconvenient and hazardous, and not to be commended. Acting on that case however, as a precedent, we will consider the case adjourned.

The exclusion of the witness Devers is supposed to be sought on the ground that he is interested to get rid of the accused as a witness against him; which would be the effect of the accused being convicted of perjury. But this effect is not peculiar to a conviction for perjury. It would follow if the accused were convicted of any felony punishable by death, or by confinement in the penitentiary. For the same act which declares that "no person convicted of perjury, although he be pardoned or punished for the same, shall be capable of being a witness in any case," declares also, that "no person convicted of treason, murder, or other felony whatsoever, shall be admitted as a witness in any case whatsoever, unless he be first pardoned, or shall have received such punishment, as by law ought to be inflicted upon such conviction." 1 Rev. Code, ch. 131, § 1, 2, p. 517. If the accused should be convicted of any capital felony, he would be put out of the way very effectually; and if sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary, though the disability is pro tempore only, yet it would have the effect to get rid of the witness at the trial, as it is not likely the civil action would be kept depending for three years at least, or more, in order to abide his discharge. In a prosecution for felony or perjury, then, suppose the accused to be a 822 material witness in a pending civil action against one who is offered *as a witness against him; is the witness offered for the prosecution incompetent for that reason? "It is a general rule that in criminal prosecutions the injured party may be a witness, although, on the conviction of the prisoner, he will in many cases be entitled to a reward.—It is the constant practice on an indictment for robbery, to admit evidence of a person who has been robbed; and it is not a sufficient objection that he will be entitled to the restitution of his property on the conviction of the offender. The same evidence is admitted in prosecutions for a cheat or perjury; and in the case of perjury it is not material whether the party has or has not paid the judgment in the suit in which the perjury was committed.—In other cases, also, the party aggrieved will be allowed to give evidence in a criminal prosecution, as he cannot afterwards avail himself of the record of conviction, in any future suit, in order to prove the criminal act." 1 Phillipps on Ev. (Cowen's edi.) 119, 120, 121. And after discussing the rule in the case of forgery, with the history and grounds of it, this author adds, "With regard to any probable advantage the witness may be supposed to receive from a conviction, by the prisoner being disabled from giving evidence in any future suit, or from the great probability of his failing in an action in consequence of the discredit which a conviction must throw upon the instrument,—these are circumstances which a jury would be directed to consider as forming a strong bias on the witness's mind, but which cannot render him incompetent." Id. 124.

This court must have acted on the principles above stated, in Baker's case, 2 Va. Cas. 353, and Gilliam's case, 4 Leigh 688, wherein it was held that a voluntary informer in the case of a misdemeanour, though liable for costs, was a good witness. For there is nothing in the statute which declares that such informer may be a witness, or necessarily implies it: as one 823 may *well be a prosecutor, and yet not the witness to procure or support the indictment.

We do not mean to say that there are no exceptions to the principle before stated. But in general, the rule applies in all criminal pleas of the commonwealth. There are some cases where, though the form of the proceeding is criminal, it is designed only as a civil remedy, and to vindicate some private right. These perhaps may be exceptions; and possibly others.

We have considered the case as if Josiah Hart were a certain and material witness against Devers in the depending civil cause. But the case does not present him in that light. For, though summoned, it is not certain he would be called, nor that if called he would be material, or would depose to any thing which might not be proved by others. Does this shew a case in which the witness would have any certain interest in his conviction? "The true test of the interest of a witness is, that he will either gain or lose by the direct legal operation and effect of the judgment, or that the record will be legal evidence for or against him in some other action. It must be a present, certain and vested interest, and not an interest uncertain, remote and contingent; and if the interest is of a doubtful nature, the objection goes to his credibility. For, being always presumed to be competent, the burthen of proof is on the objecting party, to sustain his objection to the competency; and if he fails satisfactorily to establish it, the witness is to be sworn." Greenleaf on Evid.

434. This principle we think applies to the situation of the witness, were we even mistaken in the view first presented. And though he might use the record in any future suit, yet every one else might do the same in any suit in which he was offered as a witness. In such case, the record would not be used in the ordinary sense of the rule; for, as such, it would be res inter alios acta, and could not be admitted.

824 It could be used *by every body, however, to prove the fact of the conviction, and the consequent disability of the party.

We have found but two cases, bearing more directly than others on the question before us; Rex v. Hulme, 7 Carr. & Payne 8, 32 Eng. C. L. Rep. 417, and The State v. M'Kennan, 1 Harper's South Car. Rep. 302. The first was tried before lord Denman. The defendant was indicted for perjury, committed on the trial of an action by the firm of Hulme & Co. against Gibson & others. Gibson was called, and stated that he expected the defendant Hulme would be called as a witness against him in another cause which was coming on between the same parties. The witness was objected to on the ground of interest. Lord Denman said, "The point appears to be a new one, not touched by any of the cases, and I must say I feel very great difficulty about it. And that being so, and there being no decision on the subject, I think it is my duty to receive the evidence, as we are not to disqualify witnesses without some clear determination on the subject. If I had to decide the question finally, I should reject the evidence. I only receive it because there is an opportunity of revising my decision."

The attorney general thought he ought not to press the reception of the witness against his lordship's impression. Lord Denman then said, "I think the only ground on which I could receive the evidence is, the possibility that some great public inconvenience may result from a contrary course, which does not suggest itself to one's mind on the first consideration of the subject. And perhaps I may add, that it is hardly fair to subject a witness to such strong observations as would be made upon him." This case can hardly be considered as a decision at all, or as any thing more than the strong impression of lord Denman; and of little more weight than the opposite case of Campbell v. Freeling, before lord Tenterden, cited in the argument of the attorney general.

825 *The second case (The State v. M'Kennan) is a decision of the supreme court of South Carolina, admitting a witness in a prosecution for perjury, against objections very similar to those which would exclude the witness in the present case. The defendant was indicted for perjury, alleged to have been committed on the trial of an action of slander, in swearing to the perpetration of a felony by the party who was now offered as a witness for the prosecution. This witness was objected to as incompetent on the ground of interest, inasmuch as a conviction of the defendant would prevent him from giving testimony against the witness, in case the latter should be indicted for the felony. "Certainly," said the court, "he may feel a bias, arising out of his possible consciousness, or the anticipation of such eventual consequences; but his danger is barely possible, at least until an indictment shall have been found against him. On the other hand, if every defendant could get rid of his prosecutor by charging him in turn with a felony, I know not how any real felon could be brought to justice, provided he can find out in due time the names of the witnesses against him; for he would only have to charge each with a crime, and then say that they were all interested to convict him, in order to render him an incompetent witness against themselves. This objection must go to the credit and not to the competency of the witness." In a case like the one before us, the accused would only have to learn what suits were depending against the prosecutor, or, for want of such, to get one brought, and procure himself to be summoned, in order to delay or wholly defeat the prosecution.

We all think it should be certified to the circuit court, that the witness is competent.

826 *The Commonwealth v. Burcher.

December, 1843.

Grand Juror—Qualification—Freeholder*—Escrow.—A lot of land being sold for a sum of money payable by instalments, the vendee receives immediate possession, and the vendor signs, seals, and acknowledges before magistrates, a conveyance of the land to the vendee in fee simple, which is thereupon, by consent of the parties, placed in the keeping of a third person, to be retained by him until the whole purchase money is paid, and to be then delivered to the vendee. The vendee pays some of the instalments as they become due: others are still unpaid, the time of payment not having arrived. HELD, this vendee is a freeholder duly qualified to serve as a grand juror.

In the circuit superior court of Petersburg, at November term 1843, the grand jury made a presentment against James Burcher for keeping and exhibiting an unlawful gaming table, commonly called a roulette table. Being arrested under a capias and brought into court, the defendant pleaded in abatement, that William Lea, one of the grand jury which made the presentment, was not a freeholder at the time of making the same. Issue being joined on this plea, the facts relating to the issue were stated and agreed by the defendant and the attorney for the commonwealth, as follows.

The grand juror William Lea, between two and three years ago, purchased from John Grammer a house and lot in the town of Petersburg for the price of 4360 dollars, payable by instalments, and was immediately thereafter put in possession of the property. He has quietly held possession ever since, and has made improvements on Title.—Legal title in the person is not necessary to constitute him a freeholder.

Thus a grantor in a deed of trust for the payment of debts is a legal grand juror, although the legal title has passed from him, and although the debts remain unpaid, and the time at which sale might be made has passed. Carter's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 319; Moore's Case, 9 Leigh 639.

In Cunningham's Case, 6 Gratt. 606, a purchaser, by oral contract, in possession, who had paid for the land, was held to be a freeholder.

Helmondollar's Case, 4 Gratt. 536, held that one having the equitable interest in land, entitled to call for the legal title, is a freeholder qualified to serve as a grand juror; and it is stated that, among many Virginia cases, no one denies that a cestui que trust of a freehold estate is a good grand juror, who is required to be a freeholder. See Com. v. Reynolds, 4 Leigh 663.

In the case of the Commonwealth v. Burcher, 2 Rob. 826, it was held that a vendee of a freehold, in possession, was a good grand juror, although a part of the purchase money remained at the time unpaid, and the legal title in the form of an escrow, was deposited with a third person, and could not be called for by the vendee, until all the purchase money was paid.

The principal case is cited in State v. McAllister, 38 W. Va. 509, 18 S. E. Rep. 779; Com. v. Helmondollar, 4 Gratt. 540.

In Kerby's Case, 7 Leigh 747, the court refused to declare the grand juror a qualified freeholder, because it appeared from the evidence, that he himself disclaimed title to the freehold, and instituted suit against the vendor in relation to the title and purchase money.

Same—Same—Owner or Occupier of Cistern.—The

the property to the value of 750 or 800 dollars. The whole of the purchase money has not yet been paid; but negotiable notes with an endorser were given for the same, and all the notes which have fallen due have been regularly paid. At the time of making the purchase the said Lea was allowed his choice, either to take a deed in fee simple for the property, *executing a deed of trust thereon to secure the purchase money, or to allow the deed in fee simple to be retained by a third person until the purchase money was paid. He preferred the latter course; whereupon a deed of bargain and sale, conveying the property to him in fee simple, was signed and sealed by John Grammer and Mary E. his wife; the acknowledgment of the former, and the privy examination and acknowledgment of the latter, were duly taken and certified by two justices of the peace; and the deed was, by consent of the parties, placed in the keeping of William Pannill, to be delivered to Lea on the payment of the last note due for the purchase money. (The deed and certificates were set forth in the record in hæc verba.) John Grammer held the said property by a good and valid title. There is now no contro-owner or occupier of a grist mill is disqualified to serve as a grand juror. Com. v. Long, 2 Va. Cas. 318; Moran v. Com., 9 Leigh 651.

In Moran's Case, 9 Leigh 651, it was held that the disqualification of owners and occupiers of water grist mills, though general in its terms, is limited to the jurisdiction within which their mills are situated. JUDGE SUMMERS, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, makes the following observation: "The privilege of a freeholder residing in the county to serve on grand juries, is inherent by the common law and sanctioned by our act of assembly, except so far as the latter may have taken it away on principles of public policy; therefore, in construing the latter, we deem it proper to adopt the interpretation which will least abridge the general privilege and confine the exception to the necessity and reason of the enactment."

Same—Same—Keeper of an Ordinary.—The keeper of an ordinary is disqualified to serve as a grand juror. Com. v. Willson, 2 Leigh 739. But in this case it was held that residence at the tavern was necessary in order that the disqualification prescribed by the statute might apply.

Same—Same—Alienage.—An alien is disqualified from being a grand juror. Com. v. Cherry, 2 Va. Cas. 30.

Same—Same—Loyalty.—In West Virginia loyalty is prescribed as a qualification of grand jurors. Bradford v. State, 4 W. Va. 763.

Same—Same—Grand Juror Need Not Be Native.—A naturalized citizen of the United States or a native citizen of another state of the Union is qualified to serve as a grand juror in a state in which he resides. Com. v. Towles, 5 Leigh 743.

Same—Same—Residence in County.—Residence, as well as freehold within the county, is a necessary qualification of a grand juror. Moran's Case, 9 Leigh 651.

versy between Grammer and Lea as to the said bargain and sale, and Lea is satisfied with the deed for the property, now in the custody of Pannill.

Whereupon the circuit court, with the consent of the defendant, adjourned to the general court, on account of novelty and difficulty, the questions arising on the foregoing facts and the plea in abatement aforesaid.

The cause was argued here by the attorney general for the commonwealth, and Macfarland, Allison and J. S. French for the defendant.

GHOLSON, J., delivered the opinion of the majority of the court.—We are of opinion that William Lea possessed a sufficient freehold qualification to constitute him a good grand juror. It was clearly not necessary to his competency that the legal title to the house and lot should have been in him. Cestuis que use of freehold estates are good jurors in England. Co. Litt. 272 b. Mortgagors, or grantors in deeds of trust made to secure debts, while in possession and entitled to the equity *of redemption, are good jurors in Virginia. Carter's case, 2 Va. Cas. 319; Moore's case, 9 Leigh 639. It seems sufficient if the juror is in the possession of a freehold estate, and "is enjoying the profits and the substantial ownership thereof." Lea was the tenant of the freehold in the house and lot; he was not only receiving the profits of it, but was so enjoying the possession as that no one could oust him from it. He was nowise in default; he was in the lawful possession; and a court of equity would have kept him there against the world. Should he even hereafter fail to pay the deferred instalments of the purchase money, a court of equity would not allow him to be disseized or evicted. It would regard the house and lot as his property: in the event of his failing to pay the purchase money within a limited time, it would direct the property to be sold as his, and not as Grammer's: if the amount of the sale exceeded the balance due on the purchase, the excess would be decreed to him. Grammer never can hereafter be permitted to recover or reclaim the property itself. If it were conceded that the legal title is still in him, a court of equity would yet regard him as holding it in trust for Lea. But the legal title is not in fact outstanding in him; he has so far parted with it that he can in no way recall it, while the mere act of paying the residue of the purchase money devolves it on Lea fully and unconditionally. In Carter's case and Moore's case, above referred to, this court decided that though a person had conveyed his land by deed of trust to secure the payment of debts, and though the debts were due, and the time had passed when the trustee was authorized to sell, yet if the grantor retained the possession and equity of redemption, he was a freeholder qualified to serve as a grand juror. This case is stronger than those, inasmuch as Lea is not only in possession of the land and enjoying its profits, but he is in no default, and no one can sell the land or in 829 *any wise dispossess him. His right may be likened to that of a mortgagor in possession, where the mortgagee has no right to call for a foreclosure of the equity of redemption: and that such mortgagor would be a good grand juror no one will question.

Reynold's case, 4 Leigh 663, and Kerby's case, 7 Leigh 747, which were cited at the bar, are not regarded by this court as at all conflicting with the opinion now expressed. In the first of these cases it appeared, that Smith, the grand juror objected to, had entered into a contract in writing to sell his land, provided certain conditions precedent were complied with; but the record did not shew that any one of those conditions had been performed, or that one dollar of the consideration had been paid, or that any title had been made, or even that the possession of the land had passed from Smith. As presented in the record, it was the case of a mere contract, for the violation of which by either party the other would have been entitled to redress only in the form of damages. The court properly decided that the freehold remained in Smith. In Kerby's case, the grand juror was in possession of land which he had previously agreed to purchase; but before he had paid all the purchase money, a deed was tendered him which he refused as insufficient, and he thereupon instituted a suit in chancery to litigate the question of title and the rights of the parties. This court refused to pronounce him a freeholder; not only because he had disclaimed the ownership and title to the land, but because it was deemed improper to decide in a collateral way a question which was then the subject of judicial investigation in another forum. But in that very case the court reviewed and approved the judgment rendered in Carter's case, which in our opinion is decisive of this.

We therefore advise the circuit superior court for the town of Petersburg to adjudge William Lea a good grand juror.

830 *DUNCAN, J. The question adjourned in this case involves the construction of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 75, § 1, p. 264, requiring that grand jurors shall be freeholders. The facts upon which the question adjourned is made to depend are these. A man impaneled upon the grand jury had purchased a house and lot of ground, the purchase money to be paid by instalments, and part of the purchase money was unpaid when he was so impaneled. He was in the possession of the lot, and his vendor had executed a deed to him for it; but, in order to secure the payment of the purchase money, the deed had been placed in the hands of a third person as an escrow, to be delivered to the vendee when the purchase money was paid. The purchase money not having been paid, the deed accordingly remained in the hands of the third person to whom it had been so delivered; and the question adjourned is, was the vendee under the foregoing circumstances a freeholder, so as to be a qualified grand juror?

The statute above cited directs that "the sheriff shall summon 24 of the most discreet freeholders," &c. to be a grand jury. This qualification of estate was derived from an ancient english statute, and no doubt had its origin in the idea that men having a fixed and permanent interest in the soil could be more safely entrusted with the delicate and important duty of bringing offenders against the laws to justice, and at the same time, from the independence of their condition, would afford a protection to the innocent from unjust accusations. The legislature of both countries looked to the degree and permanency of the estate, rather than the amount or value of it, as the qualification best calculated to effect the ends of public policy; and I imagine the framers of neither statute anticipated that a doubt could ever arise as to the definition of an estate of freehold. Doubt however seems to have arisen, if not as to what estate would constitute a freehold according to its strict *legal significance, yet as to what is the precise meaning of the term as employed by the statute. It is a well settled rule in the construction of statutes, that when terms having a defined common law signification are employed in a statute, that signification is intended to be adopted. We know that at the common law a freehold is an estate in lands for not less than term of life; that all estates less than that are mere chattels. We know, too, that to create by contract a freehold estate prior to the statute of uses, the feudal investiture by livery of seisin was necessary. Since the statute of uses, this investiture is by deed in writing sealed and delivered; the delivery of the deed superseding the formula of livery of seisin, in all cases where the grantor is seized and capable of making livery, as in such cases the statute annexes the possession to the use. But to create a freehold estate, there must be a union of the use with the possession; and in law there cannot be a use created, except by deed in writing sealed and delivered. This is rendered necessary by the terms of the statute itself; see 1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 1, p. 361. In the case under consideration, it is true that the juror had possession (which is a mere act in pais), but he had not the use; for the use he could only acquire by deed delivered. His possession, therefore, was not adverse to his vendor, but under him. But the vendor had executed a deed, and placed it in the hands of a third person as an escrow, to be delivered upon the payment of the purchase money: and it is supposed that the legal title has passed by the deed. I have before remarked (in the words of the statute) that to pass the freehold, the deed must be delivered. The delivery is the medium by which the title passes out of the bargainor to the bargainee. Without such delivery, the title remains precisely where it was, in the same manner as if there had been no deed at all; it remains in the bargainor. But it is asked, suppose the 832 bargainor had *died before the time of payment had arrived, and after his death the bargainee had paid the purchase money; could the deed then be delivered as an operative deed? Undoubtedly it could, and the delivery would have relation to the time when it was deposited as an escrow. The deed, by such delivery, would acquire vitality which it had not before, and would operate as an estoppel to the heirs to demand the estate, in the same manner that it would in the case where a man sells and conveys land in the adversary possession of another. We know that in such case the deed would pass nothing, by reason of the disseisin of the bargainor; and the bargainee could not in his own name evict the disseisor. But he might do so in the name of the bargainor, or of his heirs: and if the recovery was in the name of the latter, eo instanti the deed of their ancestor, which till then was inoperative and without life, would become vivified; it would relate back, upon the principle of remitter at the common law, and the heirs of the bargainor would be estopped by it. I refer to this doctrine to shew, that under the statute of uses no deed can pass a freehold estate until delivery; that if a deed be delivered as an escrow, and the condition be afterwards performed, the delivery will then be consummate, and take effect from the time of the delivery as an escrow, although the bargainor may have died in the mean time; and that cases exist where a deed may be inoperative for a time, and by subsequent events become operative, and relate back to its inception.

As a further argument to test the rule I have laid down, that delivery of a deed is indispensable under the statute of uses and conveyances, suppose the vendor in this case, after depositing the deed as an escrow, had executed a conveyance of the same lot to a third person: such last conveyance would have passed the title, and the first purchaser, although in possession (his possession not being adverse to the 833 grantor), might *have been evicted in an action of ejectment by the last purchaser. And if any person claiming the lot adversely to the juror were to bring a writ of right for the recovery of the same, he would be compelled to sue the vendor, not the juror, because a writ of right can only be maintained against the tenant of the freehold, and not against a tenant in possession having merely an equitable title.

But it is argued, that although the juror in this case may not at law be a freeholder, yet the statute will be satisfied if he have such an interest as would in equity entitle him to call for the freehold estate. This proposition, which I do not admit to be correct, may be conceded for the sake of argument; and how will the case then stand? The juror has not paid the purchase money, and until he does so, equity cannot decree to him the legal title. He may never pay it, and upon default his vendor may enter upon the premises, and may sell and transfer the legal title to another. This juror, therefore, is in this condition: he has not the legal estate of freehold, he has no present right to resort to a court of equity to obtain the legal title, and he may never have that right; for it will depend upon his ability and his will to pay. And yet he is said to be a freeholder.

But I do not concede that any estate less than a freehold will satisfy the statute. I have adverted to the reasons which, as I supposed, induced the legislature to require the certain and permanent estate of freehold as a qualification for a grand juror; and it will be found that the same qualification has been also deemed important in reference to another description of jurors.

In fixing the qualification of petit jurors for the trial of pleas of the commonwealth and for the trial of all causes in the superior courts, the statute requires that they shall be freeholders, and have a visible estate, real or personal, of the value of 834 300 dollars. *For a grand juror, a freehold of any value is sufficient: a petit jurymen must not only be a freeholder, but possessed of a visible estate, real or personal, of the value of 300 dollars at the least. The legislature, therefore, for the purpose of protecting the rights of the public, and the safety of the persons and property of its citizens, has provided that the jurymen who present for crimes, and the jurymen who try the offenders, shall have that fixed and permanent interest in the country, which will place their independence, as far as practicable, out of the reach of power, or the influence produced by fear, favour or affection. And every citizen charged with an offence has the right to demand that the grand jury which is asked to indict him, and the petit jury which is to try him, shall be composed of men who are freeholders, and nothing less than freeholders. It is not enough for him to be told, that the jurymen who are to indict or try him has contracted for the purchase of land, which he may pay for at some future time, and may possibly acquire a freehold estate in it.

If the objections to a departure from the express terms of the statute, which I have already adverted to, be regarded as insufficient, there exists one that in a practical point of view I deem conclusive; and it is this. A relaxation of the statute will involve the courts in innumerable questions of difficulty as to the qualifications of grand and petit jurymen. Adhere to the legal signification of a freehold, and all will understand it: but once adopt executory contracts for the purchase of land as a substitute for the requisitions of the statute, and what guide will be furnished to the summoning officers, or even to learned judges, by which they can determine whether the jurymen has the necessary qualification of estate or not? Will a purchaser of land in possession, with or without any agreement in 835 writing, be considered a freeholder under the statute, *merely because he has made a contract of purchase and got possession under it? A writing is not in all cases indispensable for obtaining a decree in equity for the legal title to land, as we know that part performance will take a contract out of the operation of the statute of frauds. Will it not be exceedingly inconvenient to impose upon the courts of law, in a criminal cause, a necessity to enter, in a collateral way, into the perplexing enquiries which will continually arise, whether a jurymen has such a claim to land as would justify a court of equity to decree to him the legal title? Yet such seems to me the inevitable consequence of a departure from the legal import of the qualification of freehold prescribed by the statute.

Some adjudications have taken place in this country, bearing upon the question under consideration, which it may be well to notice. It is proper to premise, however, that in England during the controversy between the houses of York and Lancaster, many lands were conveyed to uses; the feoffee holding the legal estate, but the cestui que use taking the profits. In conscience, therefore, the land was his; and the english courts extended the statute of jurors, against the letter, to embrace the cestui que use; but they have never gone any farther. The effect, however, of the subsequent statute of uses being to annex the possession to the use, the cestuis que use were converted into freeholders. In this state, in Carter's case, 2 Va. Cas. 319, a juror was held to be qualified who had given a deed of trust of his land to secure a debt, but remained in possession. This was by analogy to the decision in England prior to the statute of uses, already indicated. The general court viewed the subject in the same light in which it was looked at by the english judges: they considered, that though in form the juror had conveyed the legal title, yet in fact he was the cestui que use; that the deed of trust was not evidence of a sale of the land, but 836 *was a mere security, which might or might not be enforced. In Kerby's case, 7 Leigh 747, the question was raised whether a purchaser in possession, who had paid the purchase money and had a complete right in equity to call for the legal title, was qualified to serve as a grand juror; but a majority of the judges were of opinion that the case should be decided on other grounds. They affirmed, however, the proposition, that it would be inconvenient in practice to impose upon the courts the necessity of deciding in criminal causes, in a collateral way, the qualification of jurors resting upon a mere equitable title. There is nothing, therefore, in the rule that prevails in England, or in the adjudications of this state, that authorizes a mere purchaser of land, because he is in possession, to serve as a grand juror, although he has not paid the purchase money, and is not in a condition to demand in equity the title.

ESTILL and BROWN, J., also dissented from the opinion of the majority of the court.

HELD, this is not a writing in respect whereof forgery can be committed, either at common law or under the statute.

William S. Foulkes was indicted in the circuit superior court for the county of Henrico and city of Richmond, at October term 1841, for forging, with intent to defraud Winfree & Williamson, "a certain letter of credit and writing," in the following terms:

"Nottoway, April 24, 1841.

"Gent.

"Agreeable to Mr. Wm. I. Watkins' request, I take pleasure in making you acquainted with his name, and would say to you that he is very extensively engaged in the manufacturing of tobacco, and has made some large purchases, and says that he wishes to patronize you (on my recommendation). Your compliance with the above will very much oblige your ob't servant,

Joseph M. Foulkes.

"P. S. Mr. Watkins prefers giving a negotiable note payable in Petersburg Exchange bank, where he can always have an opportunity to send at the shortest notice and draw. He is not a gentleman (of Ingraham's standing or character) of a low mean degree, but one, I am happy to inform you, that is a perfect gentleman in every sense of the term. I am confident, as I have observed to him, that you will either let him have the money, or endorse for him. J. M. F."

The indictment contained another count, which charged that the prisoner, with intent to defraud the said Winfree & Williamson, did knowingly utter and publish as true, and use and employ as true, for his own benefit, a certain forged letter of credit and writing, (set forth in the same terms as in the first count).

At the trial, the prisoner excepted to sundry opinions of the court given against him, and tendered bills of exceptions, which were received and made part of the record.

1. The first bill of exceptions stated, that on the trial, the attorney for the 839 commonwealth, without shewing *or attempting to shew that Joseph M. Foulkes, whose name is subscribed to the letter set out in the indictment and alleged to be forged, was dead, or sick, or without the limits of the commonwealth, so that his testimony could not be had on the trial, and without shewing that any subpoena had been taken out for the said Joseph M. Foulkes, offered to prove by a witness that the said letter, and the signature to the same, were not in the handwriting of the said Joseph M. Foulkes; whereupon the prisoner by his counsel moved the court to exclude such evidence from the jury, because the said Joseph M. Foulkes was by law a competent and the best witness to prove whether the said letter or signature were genuine or not, and could better know than any other person whether the same were written or signed by him: which motion the court overruled, and decided that the said evidence should go to the jury; and to that opinion the prisoner excepted.

2. The second bill of exceptions stated, that upon the trial, the commonwealth offered evidence for the purpose of proving that in consequence, and at the time, of the presentation by the prisoner to Winfree & Williamson of the letter of credit set out in the indictment, the said Winfree & Williamson gave to him a paper signed by them, and then proved that the said paper was placed in the hands of the attorney for the commonwealth in this court, with the record of the examining court called to try the prisoner for having forged the name of one William I. Watkins to the said paper, for the purpose of framing an indictment upon it; and proved by the said attorney, that he did frame an indictment against the prisoner upon it, and filed it in the indictment with the clerk of this court; and also proved by the clerk, that he had examined the papers in his office, and could not find that paper, and that he had no recollection that it ever was in his office: and 840 then the commonwealth offered evidence for the purpose *of proving that the said paper writing was a draft drawn by the prisoner, in the name of William I. Watkins, on Winfree & Williamson, for 1000 dollars payable to said Watkins at 90 days after date, and accepted by the said Winfree & Williamson: whereupon the prisoner moved the court to exclude all evidence of the contents and character of the said paper writing, unless it were produced; upon the ground that the said paper writing was not shewn to be lost, and it was by the laches of the commonwealth that it was not produced, and no notice had been given to the prisoner, before the jury was impaneled, of any intention to offer such secondary evidence of the said paper writing: but the court overruled the motion of the prisoner, and admitted the evidence aforesaid; to which opinion the prisoner excepted.

3. The third and last bill of exceptions stated, that the counsel for the prisoner, in the course of his argument before the jury, contended, that before the jury could convict the prisoner, they must be satisfied that he forged, or uttered as true knowing it to be forged, with intent to defraud Winfree & Williamson, a letter of credit, and then proceeded to shew that the paper writing described in the indictment and offered in evidence to the jury was not a letter of credit; whereupon, after the prisoner's counsel had closed his argument, the attorney for the commonwealth asked the court to instruct the jury, that it was not necessary to the conviction of the prisoner that the jury should be satisfied he forged, or uttered as true knowing it to be forged, a letter of credit with intent to defraud Winfree & Williamson, but they might convict him if the evidence satisfied them that he forged, or uttered as true knowing it to be forged, with intent to defraud Winfree & Williamson, the paper writing described in the indictment and offered in evidence, although they should believe that the said paper writing was not a letter 841 *of credit: which instruction the counsel for the prisoner resisted, but the court gave it, and the prisoner thereupon excepted.

The jury found the prisoner guilty upon the second count of the indictment, and ascertained the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary to be two years; and the court pronounced judgment accordingly.

On the petition of the prisoner, the general court, at the last term, awarded a writ of error to the judgment.

The cause was now argued by Lyons and Scott for the plaintiff in error, and Brooke for the commonwealth.

DUNCAN, J. The court are unanimous in the opinion that there is no error in the judgment of the circuit court set forth in the first bill of exceptions; being satisfied, as well upon principle as authority, that it was not obligatory upon the prosecutor to examine Joseph M. Foulkes, whose name was subscribed to the paper alleged to be forged, as a witness to prove that said paper and the signature thereto were not in his handwriting, but that it was competent to prove the same facts by other witnesses, and that the testimony of such other witnesses would not be secondary in its nature, but of equal degree with the testimony of the said Joseph M. Foulkes, the only difference being as to its persuasive effect before the jury, which was a matter solely addressed to the discretion of the prosecutor.

The courts are also unanimously of opinion, upon the second bill of exceptions, that a legal foundation was laid for the introduction of the secondary proof therein set forth, and that there is no error in the judgment of the circuit court to which that bill of exceptions relates.

But a majority of the court (judges Brown and Fry dissenting) consider that 842 there is error in the judgment *of the circuit court set forth in the third bill of exceptions; being of opinion that the writing set out in the indictment is one of which forgery could not be committed, either at common law or under the statute.

Judgment of circuit court reversed, and judgment of acquittal entered.

December, 1843.

Court of Oyer and Terminer—Confinement in Penitentiary by Judgment of—Habeas Corpus.—A prisoner confined in the penitentiary under the judgment of a court of oyer and terminer, for an offence which such court had no jurisdiction to try, may be discharged by the general court upon a writ of habeas corpus.

Same—No Jurisdiction to Try Free Mulatto for Simple Larceny†—Statute.—Under the act of March 15, 1832. (Acts of 1831-2, ch. 22, § 9.) a free negro or mulatto, for simple larceny to the value of 20 dollars or less, must be tried by a justice of the peace of the county or corporation, and a court of oyer and terminer has no jurisdiction of the case.

Elkaney Cropper, a free woman of colour, was tried, on the 29th of March 1843, by a court of oyer and terminer held by five justices of Accomac county, upon a charge of having, on the tenth day of the same month, feloniously stolen, taken and carried away one cotton shirt and one pair of socks. The entry of the judgment was in the following terms: "It is the unanimous opinion of the court that the prisoner is guilty of the crime aforesaid. And it appearing to the court that she has heretofore been tried, convicted, and punished by confinement in the penitentiary for the crime of petit larceny, it is considered by the court that she be confined in the public jail and penitentiary house of this commonwealth for the term of five years 843 for the *crime aforesaid. And command is given the sheriff to remove her to the public jail and penitentiary house as soon as can conveniently be done."

She now presented a petition to the general court, setting forth that she is confined in the penitentiary under the sentence aforesaid; insisting that the court of oyer and terminer had no jurisdiction of the offence of petit larceny committed by a free person of colour, and consequently that her imprisonment is without colour of lawful authority; and praying that she may be brought before the court by writ of habeas corpus, and discharged.

The court awarded a writ of habeas corpus, directed to Charles S. Morgan superintendent of the penitentiary; who, in obedience thereto, brought the petitioner into court, and certified that she was detained in his custody by virtue of the aforesaid judgment of the court of Accomac county, and for no other cause. He exhibited, as a part of his return, a transcript of the record of conviction; whereby it appeared that the former conviction for petit larceny, mentioned in the entry of the judgment, was nowise set out or charged in the warrant for convening the court, or in any part of the proceedings except the said entry.

J. Mayo for the petitioner.

DUNCAN, J. By the ninth section of the act passed the 15th of March 1832, (Acts of 1831-2, ch. 22, p. 22; Suppl. to Rev. Code, ch. 187, p. 247,) free negroes and mulattoes committing simple larceny to the value of 20 dollars or less, are to be tried and punished in the same manner as slaves are directed to be tried and punished by the fifth section of the act passed the 12th of February 1828 (Acts of 1827-8, ch. 37, p. 30; Suppl. to Rev. Code, ch. 183, p. 242). The mode of trial, and the nature of the punishment, of free negroes and mulattoes *for simple larceny to the value of 20 dollars or less, are made referable to and governed by the 5th section of the last mentioned statute. That section is in these words: "If any slave shall hereafter commit simple larceny of any money &c. of the value of twenty dollars or less, he or she, for every such offence, shall and may be tried by any justice of the peace of the county or corporation in which the same was committed, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished, by order of the justice, by stripes, not exceeding thirty-nine, and if acquitted, the acquittal shall be final."

The legislature having therefore, by the 9th section of the act of 1832, placed the trial and punishment of free negroes and mulattoes for simple larceny to the value of 20 dollars or less, upon the same footing with the trial and punishment of slaves for the same offence; and as the trial of a slave for such offence is by a justice of the peace, and the punishment is by stripes it follows, that a free negro or mulatto must be tried in the same way, and punished in the same manner; and consequently the justices of the peace of Accomac county, sitting as a court of oyer and terminer, had not jurisdiction to try the prisoner for the offence with which she was charged.

And the court being of opinion, that although a writ of error will not lie from this court to the judgment of a court of oyer and terminer, to correct an error of such court in a matter of which it could lawfully take cognizance, yet that in a case clearly not within the jurisdiction of such court, it is in the power of this court to discharge a prisoner who may be imprisoned by its judgment; and being also of opinion, for the reasons aforesaid, that this prisoner is unlawfully detained in custody by the keeper of the public jail and penitentiary, in virtue of the said judgment of the court of oyer and terminer of the county of Accomac;

It is therefore ordered that she be discharged.

I. DEFINITION AND SCOPE.

Definition.—A court may be defined as a body in the government, organized for the public administration of justice at the time and place prescribed by law. 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 22.

Scope.—It is the design of this article to treat in a general way the formation and jurisdiction of particular courts, and the principles governing their powers and decisions. By reason of frequent changes in statutes, their powers and jurisdiction have been at various times restricted or enlarged. No effort has been made to explain seemingly conflicting cases, by interpolating the various statutes with their amendments, as it is presumed they are familiar to all. For questions of general and appellate jurisdiction, reference is made to the monographic notes on "Jurisdiction" and "Appeal and Error," and reference is also made to the recent constitution adopted in Virginia (1902), in which many radical changes were made in the state judiciary system.

II. CREATION—DURATION OF TERMS.

By Legislature—Dependent on Number of Inhabitants—County Court.—Where two counties had been joined and were under the jurisdiction of the same county court because they had less than 8,000 inhabitants, the legislature had the power to detach one county and take it out of that jurisdiction, when the census shows a sufficient number of inhabitants, and could establish its own county court. Foster v. Jones, 79 Va. 642, 52 Am. Rep. 637.

Composition of W. Va. County Court in 1881—Commissioners.—Article 8 of the Constitution of West Virginia, as amended October 12, 1880, provides that after January 1, 1881, county courts shall be composed of three commissioners, abolishing the old court, which consisted of a president and two justices of the peace, and the county courts are divested of all jurisdiction except the specified subjects in § 24 of the amendment. Fowler v. Thompson, 22 W. Va. 106.

Schedule of Constitution Refers Only to Courts of Record.—Section 2 of the schedule of the constitution, declaring that the courts, except as afterwards provided, should continue with the same powers of jurisdiction at law and in equity, as if the constitution had not been adopted, and until the organization of its judicial department, refers only to courts of record, and does not include mayors' courts. Richmond Mayoralty Case, 19 Gratt. 673.

Judgment in Superior Court on Day of Session of General Court.—A judgment rendered in the superior court in one county on the day when the general court of Virginia was directed by law to be held in another county, was held to be legally rendered though it was the duty of the judge to attend the session of the general court, the distance between the places where the two courts were held being judicially known to the court to be distant from each other only three hours' ride. Mendum v. Com., 6 Rand. 704.

Superior Court Created While Suit Pending in Supreme Court of United States.—Where an appeal was pending in the United States supreme court in a cause begun in the circuit court of the District of Columbia for the county of Alexandria, when that county was retroceded to Virginia, it was held that the cause was properly retained by the United States supreme court and decided by it, and that its decision was properly sent down to the superior court for the county of Alexandria established by the laws of Virginia, and ought to be enforced by that court. McLaughlin v. Bank of Potomac, 7 Gratt. 68.

Sunday Not Counted in Days of a Term.—In computing the days of a term of a court, Sunday is not counted as one of them. Michie v. Michie, 17 Gratt. 109; Read v. Com., 22 Gratt. 924.

Length of Term of Superior Court.—As there is no fixed limit by law of the term of the circuit superior court, the judge of that court may continue the session until the latest period, which will allow him to arrive at the next court by 4 P. M. of the third day of the term. Hill v. Com., 2 Gratt. 594.

Length of Term of Corporation Court.—Under §§ 28, 36, ch. 154, Code 1873, the corporation courts, which must be held monthly, may postpone the commencement of the next term, in order that a cause on trial may be proceeded with into the ensuing month. Cluverius v. Com., 81 Va. 787.

Adjournment—Failure to Sit.—It is provided by § 15, ch. 157, Code 1873, when a court fails to sit on any day to which it may have adjourned, all matters ready for the court to act upon, if it had been held on any such day, shall be in the same condition and have the same effect, as if continued to the next day of the term that the court may sit. Langhorne v. Waller, 76 Va. 213.

III. SPECIAL TERMS.

Essentials.—A special session of a county court is only legal after notice of the time and purposes of the sessions have been posted by the clerk on the door of the courthouse of the county, at least two days before the session is to be held. And to give it any jurisdiction in any matter, it must appear upon its record book that such notice was posted, and the purposes of the session must also appear from such entry on the record book. Mayer v. Adams, 27 W. Va. 245.

Statutory Provisions—Presumptions.—Section 3060, Va. Code 1887, authorizes the judge of the circuit court by an order to the clerk, to appoint a special term, and provides that the clerk shall inform the commonwealth attorney and the sheriff, and post a copy of the warrant on the front door of the courthouse and issue all process for such term. On an issue as to whether a special term had been called in conformity with this statute, it was held that where it was shown to have been complied with in respect to the posting of the order, the appellate court would presume that all its provisions were duly complied with. Harman v. Copenhagen, 89 Va. 836, 17 S. E. Rep. 482.

Same—Directory.—The provision of a statute that the clerk shall inform the commonwealth attorney and the sheriff of the appointment of a special term of a court is directory merely, and his failure to do so does not affect the validity of the proceedings had at such special term. Harman v. Copenhagen, 89 Va. 836, 17 S. E. Rep. 482.

Same—Omissions—Effect.—Where a judge of the circuit court acting under § 5, ch. 112, W. Va. Code, directs a warrant to the clerk appointing a special term, and the clerk enters the order but fails to post a copy on the door of the courthouse, the omission does not affect the validity of the proceedings at such special term. State v. Shanley, 38 W. Va. 516, 18 S. E. Rep. 734.

Same—Consent of Parties.—Section 3062, Va. Code 1887, provides that at a special term, any cause then ready for hearing may be heard with the consent of the parties. But under such section the court cannot at such term, without such consent, hear a demurrer to a bill and dissolve an injunction. Fowler v. Mosher, 85 Va. 421, 7 S. E. Rep. 542.

Where the report of a judicial sale was filed in the clerk's office before the regular March term, and should have been acted upon at that term, or the August term following, had either of those terms been held, consent was not necessary to authorize the court to dispose of it at a special term thereafter held, as § 3052, Code 1887, provides that any civil cause may be tried at a special term, which could have been lawfully tried at the last preceding term that was or should have been held. Harman v. Copenhagen, 89 Va. 836, 17 S. E. Rep. 482.

Same—Intermediate Terms—Sale for Taxes.—Under 1 Rev. Code, ch. 69, § 74, which gives the circuit court at intermediate terms, power to hear and decide all motions cognizable by them, whether the same were pending and could have been tried at the previous term or not, and § 6, Act of March 15, 1838, which gives them power to order the sale of lands for delinquent taxes in vacation as well as in term, the circuit court has power to order the sale of land for taxes at an intermediate term. Hitchcox v. Rawson, 14 Gratt. 526.

IV. RULES OF DECISION.

Stare Decisis—What Constitutes.—A prior decision of the court of appeals will not constitute stare decisis of the question involved, where only four judges were sitting, two of whom concurred only in the results and one dissented. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Wash., etc., R. Co., 99 Va. 715.

When only four judges of the court of appeals are sitting, and they are equally divided in opinion, the decree of the lower court will be affirmed, and will only be reversed when a majority concur in that opinion. Com. v. Beaumarchais, 3 Call 122.

Where in the absence of two justices, from a court of five, a case is decided on the written opinion of two, and the concurrence of the third in the result only, and it is probable that the latter assents on other grounds, the principle on which such written opinion is based is not a precedent under the rule of stare decisis. Whiting v. Town of West Point, 88 Va. 906, 14 S. E. Rep. 698, 29 Am. St. Rep. 750, 15 L. R. A. 860.

By reason of § 4, art. 3, Constitution of W. Va., a decision is not binding authority in any other case, unless concurred in by at least three judges. Bruff v. Thompson, 31 W. Va. 16, 6 S. E. Rep. 852.

Decision Establishing Rule of Property—When Changed.—When a decision has been rendered by the supreme court of Virginia, establishing a rule of property, which has been repeatedly followed in like cases, before the creation of West Virginia, it will not be disturbed or departed from by the courts of the latter state except for the most cogent reasons, and upon a clear manifestation of error. Wilson v. Perry, 29 W. Va. 169, 1 S. E. Rep. 302.

Thus a decision in Virginia, seventeen years before the formation of West Virginia, holding that an insolvent corporation having ceased to do business, could prefer creditors, and at the time of such decision a statute was in existence in Virginia, but not applicable to the case decided, which denied to a mining or manufacturing corporation the right to make any incumbrances preferring a creditor, and such statute continued until 1868, after the formation of West Virginia, when it was repealed by implication, and there has been no statute in force in that state for twenty-four years denying such right to a corporation, the law as thus settled in Virginia is the law of West Virginia, and it cannot be changed except by the legislature. The decision thus rendered has become a rule governing property, and it is not in the power of the court to change it. Pyles v. Riverside Furniture Co., 30 W. Va. 123, 2 S. E. Rep. 909.

The decisions of the old general court, when they go to establish rules of property, are authority for the court of appeals. Wallace v. Talliaferro, 2 Call 447.

Restricted to Points Actually in Issue.—Adjudicated cases can only be relied on as precedents as to points actually in issue between the parties, and not as to such as may be deemed extrajudicial, unless in relation to the latter, they shall have ripened into law by various and successive decisions. Lewis v. Thornton, 6 Munf. 87.

Rule of Interpretation.—When the principles of a decree of the court of appeals seem to be opposed to its letter, the literal interpretation ought not to be relied on as a binding precedent. Lewis v. Thornton, 6 Munf. 87.

Decision of Court of Conciliation—Consent.—The decision of the court of conciliation, established by the military authority after the war, to adjust disputes during the suspension of the civil authority, is not obligatory upon a party who did not consent to its hearing the case. Myers v. Whitfield, 22 Gratt. 780.

Circuit Court Must Obey Directions of Court of Appeals.—If the court of appeals remands a cause to the circuit court and directs a new trial in accordance with its views as set out in the opinion, it is the duty of the circuit court at the new trial to adopt those views and instruct the jury in accordance with them, if the facts are the same and the instructions are asked for. Chaffin v. Lynch, 84 Va. 884, 6 S. E. Rep. 474.

Effect of English Decisions.—In Virginia, English decisions are to be referred to for information only, not as authority. Marks v. Morris, 4 H. & M. 468.

V. MAYOR'S COURTS.

Chief Executive Officer of City—Not Subject to Corporation Court.—The mayor, when acting as chief executive officer of the city, is in no sense or to any degree the inferior of the corporation court, nor is he in any wise subject to its superintendence. They are distinct and co-ordinate departments of the corporate government. Burch v. Hardwicke, 23 Gratt. 51.

Same—Investigation of Charges against Chief of Police.—Under art. 6, § 20, Constitution of Virginia, the mayor of a city is the chief executive officer of his city, and as such is authorized to supervise the other officers thereof in the execution of their duties. In investigating charges against the chief of police, he acts as the chief officer of the city, and not as a court; and he cannot be restrained by prohibition from proceeding with the investigation. Burch v. Hardwicke, 23 Gratt. 51.

Same—Same—Cannot Remove State Officers.—Although § 20, art. 6, of the Constitution, authorizes the mayor to remove officers of the municipality, it does not invest him with power to remove state officers, although they are elected by the people of the municipality, or are appointed by its authorities, and are paid by them. The chief of police of a city is such an officer. If a mayor removes such officer he exceeds his power and is responsible to that officer in a civil action for damages. Burch v. Hardwicke, 80 Gratt. 24. See this case distinguished in Johnston v. Moorman, 80 Va. 131.

Not Authorized to Appoint Special Policeman for Railroads.—The mayor of a city is not authorized by law (§ 1230, Code 1887, amended by Acts 1893-4, p. 262) to appoint a special policeman for a railroad company. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Galliher, 89 Va. 639, 16 S. E. Rep. 935.

Continuances by Statute—Does Not Apply to Mayors.—Code W. Va. ch. 50, § 58, providing for continuances in actions before a justice does not apply to proceedings before the mayor under ch. 47, § 39, making it the special duty of the mayor to preserve the peace and good order of the town. Town of Davis v. Davis, 40 W. Va. 464, 21 S. E. Rep. 907.

Petersburg—Election to Fill Vacancy.—The constitution authorizes the general assembly to declare the mode of filling vacancies in office, when not otherwise specially provided for, and vacancies in the office of mayor are not provided for. The charter of Petersburg provides for an election of a qualified person by the common council to fill any vacancy in the office of mayor; and when such a person was so elected, and duly qualified, the former mayor who held over, was thereby removed from office. Vaughan v. Johnson, 77 Va. 300.

Richmond—Violation of City Ordinance.—The mayor of the city of Richmond has authority to try cases in which a party is prosecuted for the violation of a city ordinance. Mayo v. James, 12 Gratt. 17.

Lynchburg—Concurrent Jurisdiction—Petit Larcenies.—The mayor of the city of Lynchburg, by § 1, Act March 30, 1871, has concurrent jurisdiction with the corporation court, of all petit larcenies, and his sentence of a person convicted of such offence is legal. Thomas v. Com., 22 Gratt. 912.

VI. COUNTY COURTS.

1. FORMATION.

By Legislature.—Where two counties were joined because they had less than 8,000 inhabitants and were consequently under the jurisdiction of the same county court, it is within the power of the legislature to detach one county and take it out of the jurisdiction of that court, if the census indicates a sufficient number of inhabitants. Foster v. Jones, 79 Va. 642, 52 Am. Rep. 637.

In West Virginia in 1881—Commissioners.—The county courts of West Virginia, as they existed on the 12th day of October, 1880, notwithstanding the amendment of art. 8, of the Constitution, continued in existence with the limited jurisdiction prescribed by § 24 of said amendment, until the 1st day of January, 1881, after which day they were no longer composed of a president and two justices of the peace, but of the three commissioners mentioned in said amendment, and until the 1st day of January, 1881, they could exercise the limited jurisdiction prescribed by the amendment, at the regular terms of the courts, and in accordance with the laws then in force. Fowler v. Thompson, 22 W. Va. 106.

2. POWER AND AUTHORITY.—See sec. 4, "Jurisdiction," infra.

Derived from Statutes.—The entire authority of the county courts is derived from the enumerated powers conferred by the statutes giving them jurisdiction. Jackson v. Maxwell, 5 Rand. 636.

Constitutional Limitations in West Virginia.—For all matters that remain vested in county courts by the limitation of their jurisdiction, in consequence of the adoption of the amendment of art. 8 of the Constitution, on the 12th of October, 1880, see Fowler v. Thompson, 22 W. Va. 106.

To Admit to Record Foreign Power of Attorney in 1824.—A county court of Virginia, or its clerk, had no authority in the year 1824, to admit to record a power of attorney executed in Kentucky, where its execution was acknowledged before a notary public, and certified by him. Johnston v. Griswold, 8 W. Va. 240.

Purchase of Salt—Special Authority.—A county court exercises a special ministerial authority when it acts under a statute which authorizes it to purchase salt, and the record must show that the justices were summoned, or that a majority were present when the bond was executed, or it will be null and void. Chesterfield Co. v. Hall, 80 Va. 321; Dinwiddie Co. v. Stuart, 28 Gratt. 526; Pulaski Co. v. Stuart, 28 Gratt. 872.

Execution of Negotiable Notes for Debt by County.—It was held in Exch. Bank v. County of Lewis, 28 W. Va. 373, that a county court had no authority to execute negotiable notes for a debt due by the county, as the power conferred upon the county courts of Virginia by the provisions of ch. 53, Code 1849, to provide for the payment of sums chargeable on the counties out of the county levies, prohibits the receiving of money for that purpose in any other way.

To Lease County Property—Statutes.—The judge of a county court has no authority to authorize or assent to a lease of county property in his control for other purposes than those provided by law, and any exercise of powers not prescribed is void, and the county may recover the property. Franklin County v. Gills, 96 Va. 330, 31 S. E. Rep. 507; Franklin County v. Saunders, 96 Va. 335, 31 S. E. Rep. 1007.

To Borrow Money to Erect Buildings.—It was held in Exch. Bank v. County of Lewis, 28 W. Va. 272, that the county courts of Virginia in 1855 and 1857, had no power or authority to borrow money for the erection of courthouses or other public buildings for the use of their counties.

To Admit Surveyor's Report to Record.—It is the duty of a county court, acting under § 15, ch. 37, Code 1849, in relation to land sold for taxes, to admit to record the report of the surveyor, if it conforms to the act. It has no authority to inquire into the regularity or validity of the sale of the sheriff. Randolph v. Stalnaker, 18 Gratt. 523.

The county court in passing upon any question under § 15, ch. 37, Code 1849, acts purely in a ministerial capacity. In such case on motion by the purchaser to order the surveyor's report to be recorded, it has no authority to render a judgment overruling the motion with costs. Delaney v. Goddin, 12 Gratt. 266.

To Make Contract for Repairing Buildings.—Where a county court makes an agreement with a party, for making repairs to the public buildings of a county, it acts as a board of police in its ministerial capacity, and does not act judicially, and its obligations are distinct from its powers as a county court in its judicial capacity. After making said contract as a board, it had no authority as a court to make any alterations in it. Despard v. County of Pleasants, 23 W. Va. 318.

3. TERMS.

Held by Judge of Another County—Inability to Preside—Section 3049, Code 1887, provides that when a judge of any county court be unable to preside by reason of absence, death or any other cause, or be so situated as to render it improper for him to preside, the judge of another county may hold the term. And where the judge of another county presides without entering upon the record that the regular judge who was present was so situated as to make it improper for him to preside, the judgment is void. Gresham v. Ewell, 85 Va. 1, 6 S. E. Rep. 700.

Where it appears from the record that the judge of a county court opened the court, and on the second day thereof entered an order that it was improper for him to preside, and thereupon another judge took his seat and proceeded with the term, signing the orders of that day, this was a regular and valid session of the court. Combs v. Com., 90 Va. 88, 17 S. E. Rep. 881.

Same—Constitutional.—Section 14, ch. 154, Code 1778, which provides that in certain cases the court of one county or district may be held by the judge of another county, is constitutional. Smith v. Com., 75 Va. 904.

Change of Commencement—All Justices Present—Notice.—Under § 2, ch. 157, Va. Code 1849, authorizing the county court to change the day of the commencement of its terms, all the justices of the county having been first summoned, and a majority concurring, such change may be made without the summons having been served, all the justices being present at the time the change is proposed and having an opportunity to be heard. Jackson v. Com., 18 Gratt. 795.

4. JURISDICTION.—See sec. 2, "Power and Authority," supra.

a. AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY.

General Statement.—The pecuniary amount necessary to give the county court jurisdiction, or the amount which will take the cause out of its jurisdiction, depends entirely upon statute. This amount has been frequently changed, and no attempt has been made to trace it through the various statutes.

In West Virginia Amount Must Exceed Twenty Dollars—Test.—Under the Acts 1872-3, ch. 13, § 2, giving the county court original jurisdiction in all actions at law, where the amount in controversy exceeds $20, the amount claimed by the plaintiff, as shown by the pleadings, and not the verdict of the jury, is the test of the jurisdiction of the court. Marion Mach. Works v. Craig, 18 W. Va. 559.

Under Virginia Code 1860.—The same amount was necessary to authorize county courts in Virginia, by Rev. Code 1860, p. 663. Shelton v. Jones, 26 Gratt. 891.

Sale and Division in 1862—No Jurisdiction When Dividends Exceeded Three Hundred Dollars.—In a suit brought in 1862 for the purpose of having dower assigned, the court sponte sua decreed sale of the residue of the land for the purpose of making a division of the proceeds among the infant heirs, they being parties to the suit. The decree of sale was void because the county court transcended its jurisdiction, as the dividend of each exceeded $300. See Va. Code 1860, p. 581, § 3; Seamster v. Blackstock, 83 Va. 232, 2 S. E. Rep. 36. See also, Woodhouse v. Fillbates, 77 Va. 317; Wimblish v. Breeden, 77 Va. 324.

Monthly Term—Amount Was Twenty Dollars in 1828.

—A county court has no jurisdiction at a monthly term in any suit at law where the value in controversy exceeds $20, and therefore a confession of judgment for a debt of a larger amount, entered at a monthly term of a county court, is of no effect whatever. Wynn v. Scott, 7 Leigh 63.

b. COURT OF GENERAL JURISDICTION.

General Jurisdiction at Quarterly Terms—Monthly Terms.—The county or corporation courts at quarterly terms, may, in their discretion, receive the probate of deeds, or wills, or decide on controversies concerning mills, etc., or indeed transact any business embraced by the general jurisdiction of such courts; but at a monthly session they cannot take jurisdiction of any case expressly and exclusively assigned to a quarterly term. Wilkinson v. Mayo, 3 H. & M. 565.

Same as Circuit Courts as to Judicial Powers.—With respect to powers vested in the county courts, which are purely judicial in their nature, whether exercised according to the course of common law or by statute, they are courts of general jurisdiction to the same extent as the circuit courts. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Wash., etc., R. Co., 99 Va. 715; Pennybacker v. Switzer, 75 Va. 671. See Ballard v. Thomas, 19 Gratt. 14; Lancaster v. Wilson, 27 Gratt. 629; Hutcheson v. Priddy, 12 Gratt. 90; Ferguson v. Teel, 82 Va. 690; Hill v. Woodward, 78 Va. 765.

Prior to Code of 1873—Same as Circuit Courts—Exceptions.—Until the enactment of §§ 2, 3, ch. 124, Code 1873, the county court was a court of general and concurrent jurisdiction with the circuit court, except in respect to suits for the sale or partition of the lands of infants, or for the sale of the lands of insane persons, as to which the law gave exclusive jurisdiction to the circuit courts. Litterall v. Jackson, 80 Va. 604.

Constitutional Limitation in West Virginia.—The county courts of both Virginia and West Virginia were formerly courts of general jurisdiction, but by Const. art. 8, § 24, the jurisdiction for the courts of the latter state was restricted to matters of probate, the appointment of guardians and the settlement of their accounts, all matters relating to apprentices, to the superintendence and administration of the internal police and fiscal affairs of their counties, including the establishment of roads, ways, bridges, public landings, ferries, and mills, with authority to levy and disburse the county levy, and in all cases of contest to judge of the election, qualification and returns of their own members, and of all county and district affairs, subject to such regulations by appeal or otherwise, as may be prescribed by law. Mayer v. Adams, 27 W. Va. 244.

Proceedings to Assign Dower—Presumptions.—County courts are courts of general jurisdiction, and in a proceeding under § 9, ch. 110, Code 1860, for the assignment of dower, it is to be presumed that it had jurisdiction of the case, and proceeded regularly, in the absence of proof to the contrary. Devaughn v. Devaughn, 19 Gratt. 556.

Laying County Levy.—The county court which lays the county levy is not a special tribunal erected for that purpose, but it is the ordinary county court, and that court is a court of general jurisdiction. Ballard v. Thomas, 19 Gratt. 14.

Code Va. 1860—Minimum Amount $20.—Under Rev. Code 1860, p. 663, authorizing county courts to hear and determine all cases involving more than $20, except certain criminal cases, a county court is a court of general jurisdiction. Shelton v. Jones, 26 Gratt. 891.

Same—Sale of Decedent's Land—Partitions When Shares Exceed $300.—The county courts had jurisdiction in 1860, to sell real estate of a decedent for the purpose of paying the debts of the ancestor from whom it descended, and being a court of general jurisdiction for this purpose, every presumption must be made in favour of its proceedings when collaterally attacked. They did not have, however, jurisdiction of suits brought by guardians to sell the real estate of infants, nor of suits brought for the purpose of making partition where the shares of such infants exceed in value the sum of $300. Woodhouse v. Fillbates, 77 Va. 317; Wimblish v. Breeden, 77 Va. 324. See Seamster v. Blackstock, 83 Va. 232, 2 S. E. Rep. 36; also, Code 1860, p. 581. § 3.

C. OF ADMINISTRATIONS.—See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

Limitations—What Gives Jurisdiction.—Under 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, §§ 12, 32, the county courts have jurisdiction to grant administrations within certain limits. The place of the intestate's residence gives jurisdiction to the local courts. If he had no known place of residence, then the place of his death, or the place where his estate lies, gives jurisdiction. Ex parte Barker, 2 Leigh 719.

Removal of Executor.—The county courts in which an executor has qualified, in the exercise of the power vested in it by statute (Code 1873, ch. 128, § 18), may remove him from office. Reynolds v. Zink, 27 Gratt. 29; Snively v. Harkrader, 29 Gratt. 128; Lance v. McCoy, 84 W. Va. 420, 12 S. E. Rep. 728.

Investment of Fiduciary Money.—Under § 84, Code 1860, a county court is not authorized to make any order for investing or loaning out the money or fund referred to in that chapter, unless the commissioner who settles the accounts of the fiduciary has previously conformed to the provisions of § 16 of that chapter. And if the county acts without the report, the county court has jurisdiction on the motion of the parties whose money is invested upon notice to the other parties to annul the order. Whitehead v. Whitehead, 23 Gratt. 376.

Grant to Sheriff—Application of Distributee—Discretion.—After administration has been granted to a sheriff, on application of a distributee to be given the administration, the county court may exercise its discretion in the matter. Hutcheson v. Priddy, 12 Gratt. 85.

Same—Same—Notice.—After a county court has granted administration of an estate to the sheriff, it cannot grant it to a distributee, without notice to the sheriff. Hutcheson v. Priddy, 12 Gratt. 85.

Same—Voidable within Three Months of Death of Testator.—When a county court commits an estate to the sheriff for administration, before the expiration of three months from the death of the testator, the act is not void but voidable. Hutcheson v. Priddy, 12 Gratt. 85; Gibson v. Beckham, 16 Gratt. 326; Ballard v. Thomas, 19 Gratt. 14; Andrews v. Ivory, 14 Gratt. 236, and note.

D. OF INJUNCTIONS.—See monographic note on "Injunctions" appended to Claytor v. Anthony, 15 Gratt. 518.

Code of 1873—General Power—Jurisdiction.—By the Code 1873, ch. 175, § 6, authority is given to every judge of a county court to award injunctions where the act or proceeding to be enjoined, is apprehended, or is to be done, or is doing, in his county or district. Rosenberger v. Bowen, 84 Va. 600, 5 S. E. Rep. 607.

Cannot Enjoin Superior Court.—A county court in chancery has no jurisdiction to stay proceedings at law on a judgment of a circuit court, by injunction; and if the county court issue such injunction, the circuit court ought to disregard it. Gholson v. Kendall, 4 Leigh 612.

Cannot Enjoin Enforcement of Judgment of Superior Court.—The county court has no power to make an order to restrain the collection of a judgment at law obtained in a superior court. Hite v. Fitz-Randolph, 1 Va. Cas. 209.

E. OF BRIDGES, ROADS AND FERRIES.

Bridges—Statute Must Be Followed.—A bridge can only be established by a county court in the mode prescribed by state. Sampson v. Goochland Justices, 5 Gratt. 241.

Same—Same—Erected by Individual for Public.—A bridge, erected by an individual for the public benefit, may be established by the county court as a public bridge, but only in the mode prescribed by statute. Sampson v. Goochland Justices, 5 Gratt. 241.

Same—Same—Same—Repairs and Maintenance.—The county court is not bound to repair or maintain a bridge erected by an individual, though dedicated by him to the public and so used, unless it has been adopted by the county court in the mode prescribed by statute. Sampson v. Goochland Justices, 5 Gratt. 241.

Roads—Limitation of Power Depends on Degree of Accommodation.—No limitation to the power of the county court to establish a road is to be found in the degree of accommodation which it may afford to the public at large. This is a matter which addresses itself to the discretion of the court. Lewis v. Washington, 5 Gratt. 265.

Same—Right of Mill Owner.—The owner of a mill may apply to a county court, as of right, to appoint viewers of a road proposed to be established to his mill. Maddox v. Ewell, 2 Va. Cas. 59.

Same—Execution of Court Order by Surveyor.—County courts having jurisdiction to establish and maintain public roads in their counties, a surveyor is justified in executing an order of the county court requiring him to open a road, though such order be irregularly made. Yeager v. Carpenter, 8 Leigh 454.

Same—May Be Opened by Individual.—The county court having established a proposed road, may authorize a particular individual to open it. Lewis v. Washington, 5 Gratt. 265.

Same—Summary Alteration of Road—Re-establishment.—A county court without petition or any of the proceedings required by the statute concerning roads, makes an order summarily on motion for the alteration of a public road. The court having no jurisdiction to make such order may at a subsequent term at the instance of the party injured and on hearing set aside the order and re-establish the old road. Hollins v. Patterson, 6 Leigh 457.

Same—May Be Discontinued before Opened.—A county court having made an order establishing a public road and directing it to be opened, may entertain and act upon an application to discontinue the road before it has been opened. Senter v. Pugh, 9 Gratt. 260.

Same—Notice to Discontinue—Police Order.—When a county court discontinues a public road, or any part thereof, without giving the public notice required by law, the order is a mere police order, which may be set aside at a future term on the motion of any citizen of the county. Conrad v. County of Lewis, 10 W. Va. 784.

Same—No Discontinuation of Road Turned Over to State.—A county court has no right to discontinue any portion of a turnpike which had been turned over to the county by the state. Conrad v. County of Lewis, 10 W. Va. 784.

Ferries—Statute.—Jurisdiction to establish ferries in Virginia is conferred by statute, §§ 12, 13, ch. 64, Code 1873, on the county court. Wimblish v. Breeden, 77 Va. 324.

Same—Same—When River Is Boundary of State.—The acts of the assembly (2 Rev. Code 1808, ch. 105, and 2 Rev. Code 1819, ch. 238, p. 261) in reference to the establishment of ferries, does not authorize a county court to establish a ferry over the river which is the boundary of a state. Zane v. Zane, 2 Va. Cas. 63.

f. OF TAVERN AND LIQUOR LICENSES.—See monographic note on "Intoxicating Liquors" appended to Thon v. Com., 31 Gratt. 887.

Construction of Statute.—The substitution of the word "may" for "shall" by the act of March 6, 1882, amending the act of March 3, 1880, was not designed to leave the application to sell liquor to the arbitrary discretion of the county courts. The words "may grant the license" mean that in a proper case the court must grant it. Ex parte Lester, 77 Va. 663; Leigton v. Maury, 76 Va. 865.

Discretionary with Court—Action Final.—A county court has a discretion to grant or refuse a certificate for obtaining a license to retail ardent spirits to a person who has obtained a license to keep an eating house, and its action is final and conclusive on the question. French v. Noel, 22 Gratt. 454.

In Hein v. Smith, 13 W. Va. 358, it was said that in at least two Virginia cases it has been held that the action of the county court in granting or refusing to grant licenses for the retailing of liquors, was final and conclusive. The cases cited were Ex parte Yeager, 11 Gratt. 655, and French v. Noel, 23 Gratt. 454.

Same—Must Act but Action Uncontrolled by Circuit Court.—County courts are invested by § 3, ch. 96, Code 1849, with a discretion as to granting licenses to keep taverns. It is bound to act, and is liable to be coerced to this extent, but in its action it cannot be controlled by the circuit court. Ex parte Yeager, 11 Gratt. 655.

g. CIVIL SUITS IN GENERAL.

At Quarterly Terms—General Jurisdiction.—The county courts at quarterly terms may in their discretion, receive the probate of deeds or wills or decide on controversies concerning mills, etc., or transact any business embraced in its general jurisdiction, but at a monthly session they cannot take jurisdiction of any case expressly and exclusively assigned to a quarterly term. Wilkinson v. Mayo, 3 H. & M. 565.

Elections—Costs.—In cases of contested elections before the county court, under the Act of 1852, ch. 71, the county court has no authority to give a judgment for costs to either party. West v. Ferguson, 16 Gratt. 270; Gresham v. Ewell, 85 Va. 7, 6 S. E. Rep. 700; Wilkinson v. Hoke, 39 W. Va. 405, 19 S. E. Rep. 520. See generally, monographic note on "Costs" appended to Jones v. Tatum, 19 Gratt. 720.

Same—Removal of Judge of Election.—The county courts have authority to remove a judge of election for malfeasance in office or gross neglect of duty, though he has not been convicted by the verdict of a jury for any offence. McDougal v. Guilgon, 27

Gratt. 133; Lewis v. Whittle, 77 Va. 423; Nelms v. Vaughan, 84 Va. 698, 5 S. E. Rep. 704.

Same—Vacation of Election.—Under § 69, Acts 1870, which is an act to provide for general elections, the county courts have authority to vacate an election. Ex parte Ellyson, 20 Gratt. 10.

Attachments—Jurisdiction Only at Quarterly Terms.—It was held in Withers v. Fuller, 30 Gratt. 547, that the county court has no jurisdiction at a monthly term of the court to render judgment in favor of an attaching creditor against his debtor, but such judgment could only be had at the quarterly term of such court. The court being without jurisdiction its judgment is absolutely void. See Clafin v. Steenbock, 18 Gratt. 842; Wynn v. Scott, 7 Leigh 63; Va. Code 1873, ch. 154, §§ 8, 12; monographic note on "Attachments" appended to Lancaster v. Wilson, 27 Gratt. 624.

Same—Abatement at Monthly Term.—Where an attachment has been sued out under § 2, ch. 151, Code 1860, in a suit pending in a county court, though the defendant has given a forthcoming bond, the court has jurisdiction at a monthly term to abate the attachment. Clafin v. Steenbock, 18 Gratt. 842. See Withers v. Fuller, 30 Gratt. 552.

To Try Validity of Will.—Although a will has been admitted to record in a district court, a county court in chancery has jurisdiction to try its validity, and may direct an issue to be tried on the common-law side of the same court. Ford v. Gardner, 1 H. & M. 72. See monographic note on "Wills."

In Condemnation Proceedings by Railroad.—It was held in Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Hoard, 16 W. Va. 270, that the provisions in ch. 88, Acts 1872-3, in reference to the condemnation of land by railroad companies was not repealed nor abrogated by ch. 114, Acts 1875, and ch. 8, Acts 1879, amending the same, and that therefore the circuit court has no jurisdiction in a case where a railroad company seeks to condemn lands, the jurisdiction in such cases being confined to the county court, as decided in Railroad Co. v. Patton, 9 W. Va. 648.

To Determine Qualification to Hold Office.—A county court has jurisdiction to try on notice the qualification of a person to hold an office, which notice was given in the month of October and returned to a day of the October term of the court, § 32, ch. 118, Acts 1872-73, not requiring that it should be returnable to a day during the November term or the next succeeding term; this section only directing when the case was to be tried, and not when it should be docketed. Dryden v. Swinburn, 15 W. Va. 234.

Motion on Sheriffs' Bonds.—It was held in Carr v. Meade, 77 Va. 142, that § 5, ch. 173, Code 1873, providing remedy by motion on the bonds of sheriffs, etc., was not repealed by § 9, ch. 395, Acts 1872 and 1873, and that motions were properly cognizable in the county court in such cases, in 1879.

h. CRIMINAL CASES IN GENERAL.

Exclusive Original Jurisdiction.—Section 4016 of the Code was amended by Acts 1893-94, p. 270, and the provision, under which indictments for felonies punishable by death, which had theretofore been removed upon motion of the prisoner to the circuit court, was omitted, and the county courts were clothed, except where otherwise provided, with exclusive original jurisdiction for the trial of all presentments, indictments, and informations for offences committed in their respective counties. Gilligan v. Com., 99 Va. 816, 37 S. E. Rep. 962, 7 Va. Law Reg. 178.

No Jurisdiction of Felonies in 1860.—An indictment for petit larceny which charges that the person indicted had been previously convicted of another petit larceny, is an indictment for a felony, and a county court has no jurisdiction to try the prisoner. Rider v. Com., 16 Gratt. 499.

Recognizance to Keep the Peace.—A county court has authority to require a party to enter into a recognizance to keep the peace; certainly where the proceeding was commenced before the Acts 1847-48, ch. 14. Welling's Case, 6 Gratt. 670.

Felonies by Free Negroes and Mulattoes—Exceptions—Statute of 1831-32.—Under the construction of the statute of 1831-32, ch. 22, § 11, free negroes and mulattoes are to be tried by the county courts of oyer and terminer, in the same manner in which slaves are tried, in all cases of felony, except homicide and such crimes as were punishable with death before the statute. Com. v. Weldon, 4 Leigh 652.

VII. CORPORATION, HUSTINGS AND MUNICIPAL COURTS.

1. IN GENERAL.

Acts of Clerk in Presence of Court—Effect.—The acts of the clerk of a corporation court done in the presence of the court and under its supervision, must be taken to be done by direction of the court, and it is the act of the court. Mesmer v. Com., 26 Gratt. 976.

Judge is State Officer—City Has No Authority.—The judge of the hustings court of Richmond is a judge of the state, and the city has no authority to control his actions. Belvin v. City of Richmond, 85 Va. 574, 8 S. E. Rep. 378.

When Jury Summoned from Outside of Limits.—A corporation court has authority to direct jurors to be summoned from without the limits of the corporation for the trial of a prisoner indicted in that court, when an impartial jury cannot be obtained within the corporation. Craft v. Com., 24 Gratt. 602.

Declaration Must Lay Cause of Action in Jurisdiction.—Where a suit is brought in a corporation court, the declaration must lay the cause of action to have arisen within the jurisdiction of the court. Thornton v. Smith, 1 Wash. 81.

Jurisdiction of Municipal Court of Huntington—The municipal court of Huntington created by the act of March 4, 1879, is a court of limited jurisdiction. Rutter v. Sullivan, 25 W. Va. 427.

2. DURATION OF TERM.

Code 1873—Continuation of Term.—Under §§ 26, 36, ch. 154, Code 1873, corporation courts have authority to continue a term from day to day into the next succeeding month, and consequently change the day for the beginning of the succeeding term. Cluverius v. Com., 81 Va. 787.

Acts 1869-70—Duration Unrestrained.—Under Acts 1869-70, p. 35, the organization and jurisdiction of the corporation courts of the state was completely changed, and with it was abolished the limitation of the term to twenty days. The new court being unrestrained as to the duration of its terms, each of its terms must be held to be only terminated by the commencement of the next succeeding monthly term, unless sooner closed by the order of the presiding judge. Moses v. Cromwell, 78 Va. 671.

Same—Constitutional Provisions.—Section 14, art. 6, of the Constitution, which directs a corporation court to be held as often and as many days in each month as may be prescribed, does not require that the whole term shall be held in the same month. Hence under acts 1869-70, p. 44, the term of the corporation court of Richmond which begins on the first Monday may continue until the first Monday in the succeeding month. Chahoon v. Com., 21 Gratt. 823; Sands v. Com., 21 Gratt. 871.

3. JURISDICTION.

a. CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Co-ordinate with Circuit Courts.—By virtue of § 14, art. 6, of the Constitution of Virginia, corporation and hustings courts are vested with similar jurisdiction to the circuit courts, and are of co-ordinate dignity with them; and any act of the legislature so far as it undertakes to confer appellate power on a circuit court to review an action of a corporation or hustings court is unconstitutional and void. Watson v. Blackstone, 98 Va. 618, 38 S. E. Rep. 999.

Jurisdiction Enlarged—Felony Cases.—Section 14, art. 6, of the Constitution of Virginia, which provides that corporation courts shall have similar jurisdiction which may be given by law to the circuit courts of the state, was not intended to restrict, but to enlarge, the jurisdiction of these courts, and to elevate them to the grade and dignity of circuit courts. And it was competent, therefore, for the legislature to give to the corporation courts jurisdiction to try cases of felony, though the jurisdiction in such cases was taken away from the circuit courts. Chahoon v. Com., 21 Gratt. 822, and note.

b. CIVIL SUITS IN GENERAL.

Removal of Judge of Election.—The corporation courts have authority to remove a judge of election for malfeasance in office or gross neglect of duty, though he has not been convicted by the verdict of a jury for any offence. McDougal v. Guigon, 27 Gratt. 183; Lewis v. Whittle, 77 Va. 423; Neims v. Vaughan, 84 Va. 698, 5 S. E. Rep. 704.

Probate of Wills—Controversy Concerning Mills, etc.—The corporation courts at a quarterly term may in their discretion, receive the probate of deeds or wills or decide controversies concerning mills, etc., but at a monthly session, they cannot take jurisdiction of any case expressly and exclusively assigned to a quarterly term. Wilkinson v. Mayo, 3 H. & M. 565.

Vacating an Election.—Under § 69, Acts 1870, p. 97, which provides for the general election, the corporation courts have jurisdiction to vacate an election. Ex parte Ellyson, 20 Gratt. 10.

Attachment—Abatement.—Where an attachment has been sued out under § 2, ch. 151, Code 1860, in a suit pending in a corporation court, though the defendant has given a forthcoming bond, the court has jurisdiction at a monthly term to abate the attachment. Clafin v. Steenbock, 18 Gratt. 842. See Withers v. Fuller, 30 Gratt. 552.

Hustings Court of Richmond—When Judge Can Act for Chancery Court.—By the Act of 1869-70, p. 437, the judge of the hustings court of the city of Richmond is authorized in certain cases to perform the duties of the judge of the chancery court. Where cause pending in the chancery court was by consent submitted to its judge in vacation, and a decree was entered by the judge of the hustings court acting for the judge of the chancery court, it was held that under § 53, ch. 167, Code 1873, the decree was valid. Morriss v. Va. Ins. Co., 85 Va. 588, 8 S. E. Rep. 383.

Municipal Court of Wheeling—Recovery of Taxes.—Section 12, ch. 51, Acts 1865, establishing the municipal court of Wheeling, grants that court jurisdiction of cases, in which the city seeks to recover taxes due it. City of Wheeling v. Hawley, 18 W. Va. 472.

c. CRIMINAL CASES IN GENERAL.

Similar Jurisdiction to Circuit and County Courts.—Under the Act of April 2, 1870, ch. 38, §§ 6, 7, Sess.

Acts 1869-70, corporation courts in cities and towns having a population of more than five thousand have the same jurisdiction to try offences committed within their respective limits as circuit and county courts had; and the act of April 2, 1878, to regulate and define the jurisdiction of the county and circuit courts does not apply to or affect the jurisdiction of said corporation courts. Tremaine v. Com., 25 Gratt. 987.

No Jurisdiction of Felonies in 1860.—An indictment for petit larceny which charges that the person indicted had been previously indicted, tried and sentenced for another petit larceny, is an indictment for felony, and a corporation court has no jurisdiction to try the case. Rider v. Com., 16 Gratt. 499.

Indictment—Prisoner in Custody—Examination before Justice.—A prisoner in custody is indicted in the hustings court. He is not entitled to be sent before a justice for examination, but the court may proceed to try him upon the indictment. Shelly v. Com., 19 Gratt. 653.

Same—Felony—Removal from County Court.—An indictment for a felony was found against the prisoner in the county court of Alexandria, and it was removed to the corporation court of Alexandria. The corporation court had no jurisdiction to try it. See § 4, ch. 38, Acts 1868-70; Marshall v. Com., 20 Gratt. 845.

Proceedings against Master for Allowing Slave to Hire Himself Out.—By the provisions of 1 Rev Code, ch. 111, § 81, the court of hustings has jurisdiction to proceed against the master who permits a slave to go at large and hire himself out contrary to the provisions of the above act. Abrahams v. Com., 1 Rob. 675.

Hustings Court of Richmond—Extent of Jurisdiction.—The criminal jurisdiction of the hustings court of the city of Richmond, conferred by the acts of 1808 and 1842, extends one mile beyond the city limits. Jordan v. Com., 25 Gratt. 943.

Same—Jurisdiction of Felony Cases.—In Chahoon's Case, 21 Gratt. 825, the point was made by counsel, that under the constitution in force at that time the hustings court of Richmond could not be given jurisdiction to try cases of felony. The court said since the case of Boswell v. Com., 20 Gratt. 860, Bird's Case, 21 Gratt. 800, and Smith's Case, 21 Gratt. 809, all proceed upon the tacit admission of the existing jurisdiction of the corporation courts to try such cases, the court was of opinion that the hustings court of the city of Richmond had jurisdiction over the case. Boswell v. Com., 20 Gratt. 860.

Same—Forgery—Civil Proceedings in County of Henrico.—Though a suit at law was brought in the county court of Henrico upon a forged note and judgment recovered, and a suit in equity to enforce this judgment was brought in the circuit court of Henrico, yet as both these courts were held in the limits of the city of Richmond where the prisoner lived, the hustings court of the city had jurisdiction to try him for the offence. Chahoon v. Com., 20 Gratt. 733; Sands v. Com., 20 Gratt. 800.

Municipal Court of Wheeling—Violation of Revenue Laws—Constitutional Law.—An act relative to the municipal court of Wheeling was unconstitutional where it attempted to confer sole jurisdiction on that court of cases involving a violation of the revenue laws by selling spirituous liquors on the Sabbath. It did not take away the jurisdiction of the circuit court in such cases, and is in violation of § 6, art. 6, of the Constitution, which provides that the circuit court shall have original jurisdiction of all crimes and misdemeanors. Eckhart v. State, 5 W. Va. 515.

Hustings Court of Roanoke—No Jurisdiction Prior to Incorporation.—Prior to the incorporation of Roanoke, act January 31, 1884, and to the creation of the hustings court of that city, act Feb. 25, 1884, the county court of Roanoke county had jurisdiction of all cases committed in what afterwards became the city limits. The hustings court had no jurisdiction of a murder committed there January 27, 1884. Ryan v. Com., 80 Va. 385.

VIII. CIRCUIT COURTS.

1. JURISDICTION IN GENERAL.

Court of General Jurisdiction.—The circuit court is the court of general jurisdiction, taking cognizance of all actions at law between individuals, with authority to pronounce judgments and to issue executions for their enforcement. Where its jurisdiction is questioned it must decide the question itself. Cox v. Thomas, 9 Gratt. 323.

In Vacation.—The circuit court can make in vacation only such decrees or judgments as are authorized by statute. Tyson v. Glalze, 23 Gratt. 799.

After Final Decree.—Section 2451, Code 1887, providing that the circuit court may reverse a judgment or decree for certain mistakes and errors for which an appellate court might reverse it, does not authorize it, after entering a final judgment remanding a cause to the county court, at a subsequent term to assume jurisdiction and to dispose of the case upon its merits. Thompson v. Carpenter, 88 Va. 702, 14 S. E. Rep. 181.

Judgment Rendered on Day General Court Held.—A judgment is rendered in the superior court of Chesterfield on the 15th of November, the day on which the general court is directed by law to be held at the capitol; the distance is judicially known to be not more than three hours moderate ride from one place to the other. It does not appear on the record but that the judgment might have been rendered in time to enable the judge to close that court, and attend at the capitol to his duties as one of the general court, on the same day. The superior court had jurisdiction to render the judgment on that day. Mendum v. Com., 6 Rand. 704.

2. JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT.

Former Rule—Usury.—It was formerly the rule that a superior court of chancery had jurisdiction only where the subject in controversy exceeded $150. But when a bill was brought for relief against usury, it had jurisdiction, although the usury was for less than that sum, as it and the principal exceeded it. Stone v. Ware, 6 Munf. 541. For the jurisdictional amount in the circuit courts, see § 3058, Va. Code 1887, and § 2, ch. 112, W. Va. Code 1899.

Reduction by Set-Off—By Payment.—Thus it was held that the superior court had no jurisdiction of cases where the demand was less than $100, but the reduction by a set-off did not affect its jurisdiction. The rule was otherwise when it was reduced by payment. Larowe v. Binns, 2 Va. Cas. 203; Ferguson v. Highley, 2 Va. Cas. 255.

Damages Uncertain—Verdict.—Where the damages for breach of contract were uncertain, and therefore unknown until ascertained by verdict, the superior court had jurisdiction although the verdict is for less than $100. Newsom v. Pendred, 2 Va. Cas. 93.

Penalty of Sufficient Amount.—The defendant, in an action upon a penal bill for $100, conditioned to pay $47.77, moved for a stay in the proceedings, because the penalty was inserted for the purpose of giving the court jurisdiction not passed by law. It was held that the court had jurisdiction. Heath v. Blaker, 2 Va. Cas. 215. See Newell v. Wood, 1 Munf. 555, which holds that the penalty decides the jurisdiction.

3. PLACE.

Functions Exercised Only at Places Fixed by Law.—It is a fundamental principle that courts of general and original jurisdiction may exercise their functions only at such times and places as are fixed by law, and that the judge in vacation can enter no orders except such as are expressly authorized by statute, and he is restricted by its very terms. Chase v. Miller, 88 Va. 791, 14 S. E. Rep. 545.

Judge May Sue in His Circuit.—Section 8214 of the Code, re-enacted and amended by chaps. 829, 736, Acts 1899-00, provides that if a judge of a circuit court be interested in a case, it "may" be brought in an adjoining circuit. It was held in Harrison v. Wissler, 98 Va. 597, 36 S. E. Rep. 982, that the word "may" was permissive, and that it does not preclude a judge from suing in his own circuit.

Removal of Court.—Where a courthouse is undergoing repairs and is not in a fit condition to be occupied, the circuit court may remove to another place, and continue its sessions there. Caperton v. Bowyer, 4 W. Va. 176.

Of Henrico at State Courthouse.—The act of 1852 which provided that the circuit court of Henrico county should be held at the state courthouse in Richmond, does not violate art. 6, § 6, Const., providing that the circuit court shall be held by the judge of each circuit at least twice a year, the constitution being silent as to the place of holding such court. Com. v. Scott, 10 Gratt. 749.

The Granting of Administrations.—Under 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, §§ 12, 32, the circuit courts have jurisdiction to grant administrations within certain limits. The place of the intestate's residence gives jurisdiction to the local courts. If he has no known place of residence, then the place of his death, or the place where his estate lies, gives jurisdiction. Ex parte Barker, 2 Leigh 719.

4. WHEN STATE OR STATE OFFICIAL PARTY.

Administration—Claim against State.—A resident of Kentucky dies intestate there, having no estate in Virginia but a claim on this commonwealth for money. It was held that the circuit court of Henrico county, wherein is the seat of government, has jurisdiction to grant administration of such decedent's estate. Com. v. Hudgin, 2 Leigh 248.

Circuit Court of Richmond—State Treasurer Party—Exclusive Jurisdiction.—Code 1873, ch. 44, §§ 7, 8, conferring exclusive original jurisdiction on the circuit court of Richmond in cases where the state treasurer is a party, is mandatory, and ousts all jurisdiction in such cases from every other court. Taylor v. Williams, 78 Va. 422.

Same—Exclusive Equitable Jurisdiction.—By Acts of Assembly 1869-70, p. 42-3, the circuit court of the city of Richmond has no equitable jurisdiction except in certain specified cases, in which the state is interested, or some of the officers and boards, representing the state, are necessary and proper parties, and in such cases its jurisdiction is exclusive. Ragland v. Broadnax, 29 Gratt. 401.

Same—Suit by Commonwealth.—Under § 1, ch. 165, Code 1873, the circuit court of the city of Richmond alone has jurisdiction of any suit to enjoin or affect any judgment or decree in behalf of the commonwealth, and no such suit can be maintained in any other court of the state. Com. v. Latham, 85 Va. 682, 8 S. E. Rep. 488.

Same—Commissioner of Agriculture.—By § 4, ch. 155, Code 1873, the circuit court of the city of Richmond has no chancery jurisdiction, except in suits in which it may be necessary or proper to make certain enumerated officers or public corporations parties defendant. The commissioner of agriculture is not within the exception. Blanton v. Southern, etc., Co., 77 Va. 335; Ragland v. Broadnax, 29 Gratt. 401.

5. JURISDICTION IN CIVIL SUITS GENERALLY.

To Grant License for Retail of Ardent Spirits.—The statute, Acts 1879-80, p. 148, in regard to license for retail of ardent spirits, provides that the county court "shall grant the license" if the one applying therefor shall bring himself within its requirements, and that the circuit court "may grant the license." The latter words mean that the circuit court shall have jurisdiction to grant the license, and must grant it if the applicant conforms to its requirements. Leigton v. Maury, 76 Va. 865.

Condemnation Proceedings—Removal—Report of Commissioners.—Where commissioners are appointed under § 1, ch. 174, Code 1860, for the purpose of ascertaining compensation to landowners for land proposed to be taken by a railroad company, which cause has been removed to the circuit court, if it is set aside by the court, it should not send the case back to the county court; but should take jurisdiction of the case, and proceed in it with the same powers that are vested in the county court by the statute. Virginia, etc., R. Co. v. Campbell, 22 Gratt. 437.

Same—West Virginia Practice.—It was held in Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Hoard, 16 W. Va. 270, that the provisions in ch. 88, Acts 1872-3, in reference to the manner in which lands shall be condemned by railroad companies, is not repealed nor abrogated, by ch. 114, Acts 1875, and the amendatory Act of 1879, ch. 8, and that therefore the circuit court has no jurisdiction in a case where a railroad company seeks to condemn land; but that jurisdiction in such cases is confined to the county court, as was decided in Railroad Co. v. Patton, 9 W. Va. 648. See generally, on this subject, monographic note on "Eminent Domain" appended to James River, etc., Co. v. Thompson, 3 Gratt. 270.

To Sell Real Estate Devised.—Under § 20, ch. 112, Code 1873, the circuit courts have jurisdiction to sell real estate devised by a testator to his two children for life, with remainder to their issue, if any be living at the time of their deaths; and if either should die without issue living, then to go to the issue of the other. Troth v. Robertson, 78 Va. 46.

To Rehear Remanded Cause.—When the court of appeals, in pursuance of § 5, ch. 171, Act 1869-70, sends a cause to a circuit court, which had been pending in a district court of appeals, that act was constitutional, and the circuit court has jurisdiction to rehear and decide the case. Cowan v. Doddridge, 22 Gratt. 458; Kent v. Dickinson, 26 Gratt. 817; Cowan v. Fulton, 28 Gratt. 579.

To Compel Supervisors by Mandamus to Permit Treasurer to Qualify.—Section 4, art. 7, of the Const., provides that board of supervisors shall be the judges of the election, qualifications, and returns of their own members, and of all county and township officers. Under this provision the circuit court of a county has no jurisdiction to compel the board of supervisors by mandamus to permit a person to qualify and give bond as treasurer of that county. This function involves discretion and is not a ministerial act. Board of Supervisors v. Minturn, 4 W. Va. 300.

Mandamus, Prohibition and Certiorari—Restraint.—Section 12, art. 8, W. Va. Const. 1872, giving to circuit courts the jurisdiction over all inferior tribunals, by mandamus, prohibition and certiorari, is restrained and limited by § 29 of the same article, which provides that in certain cases the county courts shall have jurisdiction of all appeals from justices, and their decision shall be final. Poe v. Machine Works, 24 W. Va. 517.

Quo Warranto.—Held in Bland and Giles County Judge Case, 33 Gratt. 443, that the writ of quo warranto was not abolished in Virginia, and that the circuit courts had jurisdiction of the same.

Recovery of Money by Motion—Section 3211, Va. Code, authorizes a remedy by motion in the circuit court in those cases in which the plaintiff is entitled to recover money by action on contract, and where the proceeding is founded upon a tort, it has no jurisdiction of the case. West. Union Tel. Co. v. Bright, 90 Va. 778, 20 S. E. Rep. 146; West. Union Tel. Co. v. Pettyjohn, 88 Va. 296, 13 S. E. Rep. 431. See material changes in procedure to recover money by motion, in the amendment of § 3211, by Acts 1895-96, p. 140.

Injunctions—Proceedings Out of Circuit.—Section 41 of the circuit superior court law, Supp. Rev. Code, ch. 109, giving jurisdiction to each of the judges of that court to award injunctions to judgments rendered or proceedings apprehended out of his own circuit, but directing that the order shall be directed to the clerk of the county in which the judgment is rendered or the apprehended proceeding is to be had, gives the judge jurisdiction only to award the injunction, not to hear and determine the cause. Randolph v. Tucker, 10 Leigh 655.

Same—Entry on Land.—By § 3436, of the Code, the jurisdiction of a suit for injunction is in the circuit court of the county in which the act or proceeding is to be done, or is done or apprehended. Thus where an entry on land is sought to be restrained by injunction, it cannot be maintained in a county other than that in which the land is situated. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Cable Co., 88 Va. 932, 14 S. E. Rep. 689; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Cable Co., 88 Va. 936, 14 S. E. Rep. 690.

Over Church Trustees.—While the circuit courts have general powers as courts of law and chancery, their jurisdiction in a summary proceeding under § 9, ch. 76, Code 1873, is special, and limited to the appointment and removal of church trustees, but it does not extend to the regulation of their conduct in administration of the trust under the instrument creating it. Wade v. Hancock, 76 Va. 620.

Lunatics—Mandamus against Superintendent of Asylum.—The circuit court of the county in which a lunatic resides has jurisdiction of mandamus proceedings brought to prevent the superintendent of the asylum, in which she had been confined, from retaking the lunatic, and where that is the place in which it is apprehended that the act will be done. Statham v. Blackford, 89 Va. 771, 17 S. E. Rep. 238.

Same—Concurrent Jurisdiction to Appoint Committees—Question of Insanity.—By §§ 1697, 1698, 1700, of the Va. Code 1887, circuit courts are given concurrent jurisdiction with county and corporation courts to appoint committees for lunatics, after they have been adjudged insane by three justices, or by the county or corporation court of the county or corporation of which they are inhabitants. The circuit courts are nowhere given the power to try the question of insanity, and the power to appoint a committee does not include such power. Harrison v. Garnett, 86 Va. 768, 11 S. E. Rep. 123.

Bastardy Cases—Maintenance of Child.—When the act of December 9, 1873, entitled "An act to amend and re-enact chap. 80 of the Code, concerning the maintenance of illegitimate children," went into operation, it did not oust the jurisdiction of the circuit courts to hear and determine cases of bastardy, where recognizance had theretofore been given, requiring the defendant to appear at the next term of the circuit court and answer the charge. After the passage of this act proceedings in the circuit court should conform as far as practicable to its requirements. Tennant v. Brookover, 12 W. Va. 337.

6. JURISDICTION IN CRIMINAL CASES GENERALLY.

Jurisdiction by Election of Prisoner—No Power to Remand.—Where a circuit court acquired jurisdiction by the election of the prisoner to be tried there, it has no power to remand the case to the county court for any purpose not even on the motion of the prisoner himself, and an order to that effect is a nullity. Nicholas v. Com., 91 Va. 741, 21 S. E. Rep. 364.

Same—Same—Exclusive Jurisdiction—Not an Appellate Tribunal.—Where one arraigned for murder in a county court elects under § 4016, of the Va. Code, to be tried in the circuit court, the latter has exclusive jurisdiction to try the case, and cannot sit as an appellate tribunal to consider supposed errors of the county court, where the record is not transmitted to it; and an order by it remanding the cause to the county court for trial is erroneous, and confers no jurisdiction on the latter. Howell v. Com., 86 Va. 817, 11 S. E. Rep. 238.

Same—Same—Jurisdiction of Horse Stealing.—It was held in Price v. Com., 21 Gratt. 846, where a person was indicted for receiving a stolen horse and also for the larceny of the horse, and had elected to be tried in the circuit court, he could not on trial there move the court to send him back to the county court for trial, on the ground that the circuit court had no jurisdiction to try him. The act of February 16, 1866, making horse stealing punishable with death or confinement in the penitentiary at the jury's discretion, had not been repealed and the circuit court had jurisdiction of the case.

Same—Record Must Be Certified.—When on his arraignment the prisoner demanded to be tried in the circuit court and the record of the indictment and proceedings in a county court were not certified to the circuit court, as required by § 4016 of the Code, that court is without jurisdiction to try the prisoner. Mitchell v. Com., 89 Va. 826, 17 S. E. Rep. 480.

Same—Cannot Elect in Corporation Court.—A prisoner indicted in a corporation court for murder, is not entitled to elect to be tried in the circuit court. See Acts 1860-70, p. 35; Boswell v. Com., 20 Gratt. 860, and note.

Circuit Court of Richmond—Jurisdiction of Convicts.—In Ruffin v. Com., 21 Gratt. 790, a penitentiary convict was hired to work on a railroad, and in Bath county, in attempting to escape, he killed his guard. It was held that he may be tried for the offence before the circuit court of the city of Richmond, and by a jury summoned from that city.

Disturbance of Religious Worship.—The circuit superior courts have jurisdiction to try offences against the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 141, forbidding the disturbance of congregations assembled for the purpose of religious worship. Com. v. Jennings, 8 Gratt. 624.

Entitled to Examination before a Justice—Acts 1867.—A prisoner is indicted for felony in the circuit court, being in custody at the time. The circuit court has no jurisdiction to try him on this indictment, but he must be sent before a justice for examination and commitment for trial in the county court, under the act of the assembly of April 27, 1867. Wright v. Com., 19 Gratt. 626.

On the 24th of June, 1867, the prisoner was committed by a justice of the peace for examination upon the charge of murder. The examining court which commenced on the 2d of July, sent him on for trial before the circuit court. At the October term of the latter court he was indicted for murder, and when arraigned tendered a plea to the jurisdiction of the court. It was held that the court had jurisdiction to try him, as the act passed April 27, 1867 (Acts 1866-67, p. 915), to revise and amend the criminal procedure, provided that it should go into operation on the 1st of July, 1867, and it repealed the law in relation to examining courts. Still a prisoner committed on charge of murder prior to that time must be committed for examination, and it was proper to proceed under the former law in the examination of the prisoner before an examining court, and his trial before the circuit court. Phillips v. Com., 19 Gratt. 485. See Chahoon's Case, 20 Gratt. 785.

Homicide by Free Negroes and Mulattoes.—Under the construction of § 11, ch. 22, Acts 1831-32, free negroes and mulattoes are still to be tried by jury in the circuit superior courts for homicide and such crimes as were punishable with death before the statute. Com. v. Weldon, 4 Leigh 652.

Transfer to Another Court—Time of Trial.—When the circuit court of Warwick sends an indictment to the circuit court of York to be tried at its June term, 1831, the circuit court of York can try it at any term, and the circuit court of Warwick had no power to direct it be tried at any particular time. Brooks v. Com., 4 Leigh 669.

IX. COURT OF APPEALS.

1. IN GENERAL.

First Court Was Legislative Organization.—The first court of appeals was a legislative court only, and it was not necessary that the judges should produce any commissions, or that the executive be present when they qualified; for the act constituting the court had not directed commissions to be issued, or the oaths to be taken in the presence of the executive; and the judges by construction of law knew each other to be judges of the courts to which they respectively belonged. First Case of the Judges, 4 Call 1.

Effect of Mandate of Supreme Court of United States.—The court of appeals will consider whether a mandate issued by the United States supreme court, directing it to enter a judgment, reversing one which it had pronounced before, be authorized by the constitution or not, and being of opinion that such mandate is not so authorized, will disobey it. Hunter v. Martin, 4 Munf. 1. See Hunter v. Martin (U. S.), 1 Wheat. 304, and Cohens v. Virginia (U. S.), 6 Wheat. 264, where the United States supreme court overruled the above case.

Cannot Review Decisions of Preceding Court.—The enabling act of March 5, 1870, which authorized the court of appeals under the new constitution to rehear such judgments and decrees as were rendered after the restoration of the state to the Union, is unconstitutional, being an invasion of judicial authority. The legislature has no power to authorize a court to review the decisions of the court that preceded it. Griffin v. Cunningham, 20 Gratt 31; Teel v. Yancey, 23 Gratt. 601.

Decree of Pretended Court in 1861 Invalid.—Where a case was pending under the lawful court of appeals of Virginia, on April 17, 1861, a decree rendered by the pretended court on November 17, 1861, acting under authority of citizens then in insurrection against the United States, is not binding on the parties. Snider v. Snider, 3 W. Va. 200.

Decree Entered under Color of Authority Valid.—The judgments and decrees of the judges of the court of appeals, who were in office under military appointment, and who held over and continued to exercise the duties of their office after the state was restored to the Union, are valid and binding because they acted under color of authority. Griffin v. Cunningham, 20 Gratt. 31.

2. TRANSFER OF CAUSES.

From One Place of Session to Another—Consent.—The supreme court of appeals has the right to transfer a case from one place of session to another by § 3003, of the Va. Code 1887, which provides that by consent of parties, or for reasons appearing to the court, any case pending in said court may be transferred to another place of session. Lillienfeld v. Com., 92 Va. 818, 23 S. E. Rep. 882. See Gilbert v. Washington, etc., R. Co., 33 Gratt. 586.

From District Court to Circuit—Constitutional.—Acts 1869-70, p. 227, in relation to the transfer by the court of appeals of cases pending in the district court of appeals to the circuit court, to be heard there as by an appellate court, are constitutional. Cowan v. Fulton, 23 Gratt. 579.

3. SPECIAL COURT.

Act Establishing Constitutional.—The act of March 31, 1848, establishing a special court of appeals, constituted of judges of the circuit courts, is constitutional. Sharpe v. Robertson, 5 Gratt. 518.

Same—Decision Binding.—The act of February 23, 1872, to provide a special court of appeals, which creates one consisting of three judges of the circuit courts, is constitutional, and the decisions of the courts are valid and binding on the parties in the cause. Bolling v. Lersner, 26 Gratt. 36.

Is Not a Supreme Court.—The special court of appeals is not a supreme court of appeals, but belongs to the class of superior courts provided for in the constitution of Virginia. Sharpe v. Robertson, 5 Gratt. 518.

Proper Cases to Be Decided.—The proper cases to be decided by the special court of appeals are all cases on the docket of the court of appeals, not involving a constitutional question, and not decided in the lower court by one of the judges of the special court. It is the duty of the judges of the court of appeals to select the cases to be tried by the special court. Bolling v. Lersner, 26 Gratt. 36.

To Decide Election Contests—Limited Jurisdiction.—The court created by § 13, ch. 6, W. Va. Code 1863, to determine the election of certain state officers therein named has no common-law jurisdiction, and therefore cannot permit amendments of notices and specifications after the time has passed within which the parties may correct omissions and supply defects. Loomis v. Jackson, 6 W. Va. 612.

4. JURISDICTION.

a. IN GENERAL.

Errors in Lower Court Not Corrected by Original Suit—Fraud.—The supreme court of chancery cannot correct errors in a decree of an inferior court by an original suit, although in that way it may impeach such a decree for fraud, and under peculiar circumstances would lend its aid to carry a decree of an inferior court into effect. Banks v. Anderson, 3 H. & M. 20.

Judges May Award Injunctions.—The judges of a court of appeals, or any one of them out of court, have power to award injunctions, which have been refused by the judge of any superior court of chancery, but this power is not possessed by the court of appeals. Mayo v. Haines, 2 Munf. 423.

Interlocutory Decree—When Set Aside.—An interlocutory decree, which is entered at one term of the court of appeals, may be set aside at a subsequent term. Com. v. Beaumarchais, 3 Call 122.

b. CRIMINAL JURISDICTION.—In Bedinger v. Com. (1803), 3 Call 461, it was held that the court of appeals had no jurisdiction in criminal cases, and therefore no appeal would lie to it from a judgment of the district court.

The general court continued to be the supreme criminal court until its abolishment by the constitution of 1851, when its appellate jurisdiction was given to the supreme court of appeals, which had no jurisdiction prior to that time. Va. Code 1887, § 4052, as amended by Acts 1897-98, p. 622. But the court of appeals had jurisdiction in criminal cases adjourned from general court. See Com. v. Caton (1782), 4 Call 5.

c. ORIGINAL JURISDICTION.

(1) In General.

Criminal Orders for Unappropriated Land—A court of appeals had exclusive jurisdiction of cases concerning the orders of council, before the revolution, in favor of companies for tracts of unappropriated land, under the act of 1779. Hamilton v. Maze, 4 Call 196.

Application to Open Decree against Infant.—Section 7, ch. 132, W. Va. Code, authorizing one, against whom a judgment was rendered while an infant, to apply for an opening thereof within six months after attaining his majority, does not give the supreme court of appeals original jurisdiction of such application. Ewing v. Winters, 39 W. Va. 489, 20 S. E. Rep. 572.

Former Rule—No Original Jurisdiction.—In Mayo v. Clarke, 2 Call 389, it was held that the court of appeals had no original jurisdiction, and could not decide the merits of any case, until they had been passed upon by the district court.

(2) Mandamus, Prohibition and Habeas Corpus.

Constitutional Provisions.—By § 2, art. 6, Va. Const., and § 8, art. 6, W. Va. Const., original jurisdiction is conferred upon the court of appeals in cases of habeas corpus, mandamus and prohibition. Taylor v. Williams, 78 Va. 422; Com. v. Latham, 85 Va. 632, 8 S. E. Rep. 488; Douglass v. Loomis, 5 W. Va. 542; Fleming v. Commissioners, 31 W. Va. 608, 8 S. E. Rep. 267.

Same—West Virginia Rule.—By a rule adopted in West Virginia by its court of appeals, it will not take such original jurisdiction unless special reasons appear therefor; when such reasons appear it will unhesitatingly exercise its jurisdiction. Fleming v. Commissioners, 31 W. Va. 608, 8 S. E. Rep. 267.

Same—Virginia Decisions.—In Virginia it is firmly established that the Constitution, § 2, art. 6, does not proprio vigore confer jurisdiction upon the court of appeals, but it was intended to give the legislature power to do so. In other words, it provides that the court shall have appellate jurisdiction only, except in the cases enumerated, but it does not provide that it shall have original jurisdiction in every case where habeas corpus, mandamus, or prohibition is the appropriate remedy; but leaves the jurisdiction in those cases to be regulated by law. Gresham v. Ewell, 84 Va. 784, 6 S. E. Rep. 134; Barnett v. Meredith, 10 Gratt. 650; Prison Assoc. v. Ashby, 93 Va. 667, 25 S. E. Rep. 893; Cook v. Daugherty, 99 Va. 590, 39 S. E. Rep. 223; Page v. Clopton, 30 Gratt. 417; Price v. Smith, 98 Va. 14, 24 S. E. Rep. 474. See §§ 3454-55, Va. Code.

Mandamus—Inspection of Poll Books.—Under § 132, Va. Code, the right clearly exists to inspect the poll books, and under § 3586 of the Code, the court of appeals has jurisdiction to issue a writ of mandamus to compel the custodian of such books to allow such inspection, and take proper notes therefrom. See § 84 of the Code; Keller v. Stone, 96 Va. 667, 32 S. E. Rep. 454. See Gleaves v. Terry, 97 Va. 491, 25 S. E. Rep. 552.

Same—Compelling Inferior Court to Sign Exceptions.—The jurisdiction of the court of appeals by mandamus to compel an inferior court to sign and seal bills of exceptions, or to amend such bills according to the truth of the case, is well settled in this state. Collins v. Christian, 98 Va. 1, 24 S. E. Rep. 472; Page v. Clopton, 30 Gratt. 415, with foot-note containing full list of authorities on this question.

Same—Where Tried—Statute.—Section 3034 of the Code provides that a writ of mandamus shall issue and be tried at the place of session of the court of appeals at which writs of error to such court are to be tried. Section 3091 names Staunton as the place at which writs of error from the hustings court of Staunton shall be heard. The court of appeals sitting in Richmond has no jurisdiction to issue a mandamus to compel the judge of said hustings court to issue a writ for a special election, and the filing of an answer by the judge, in which the question of jurisdiction was not raised, did not confer jurisdiction. Hotchkiss v. Grattan, 90 Va. 642, 19 S. E. Rep. 165.

Same—To Compel Circuit Judge to Try Cause.—Neither under the constitution nor by statute has the supreme court of appeals jurisdiction to issue a mandamus to a judge of the circuit court, to compel him to try a cause therein pending. Barnett v. Meredith, 10 Gratt. 650.

Same—Effect of Similar Jurisdiction of Circuit Court.—Section 3086, Va. Code, giving the supreme court of appeals original jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus in cases in which a mandamus may issue according to the principles of the common law, does not take a case of which the circuit court also has jurisdiction out of the original jurisdiction of the said court on the ground that, since the circuit court has jurisdiction, the interposition of the court of appeals is not necessary to prevent a failure of justice. Clay v. Ballard, 87 Va. 787, 18 S. E. Rep. 262.

Prohibition—No Jurisdiction over County Courts.—Section 4, ch. 156, Code 1873, provides for the issuance of the writ of prohibition from the court of appeals to the circuit and corporation courts, and to the hustings and chancery courts of the city of Richmond. The county courts are not mentioned, and it is clear that the legislature intended to restrict the jurisdiction of the court to issuing the writ to the courts mentioned in the act. Gresham v. Ewell, 84 Va. 784, 6 S. E. Rep. 134.

X. DISTRICT COURT.

Indictment for Felony—No Jurisdiction without Examination.—The district court has no original jurisdiction to receive and sustain an indictment for felony, before an examination before a court of justices in the manner prescribed by law. Anonymous, 1 Va. Cas. 143.

Same—Prior to 1804.—Before the act of 1804, a person might be tried in the district court for a felony, notwithstanding there had been no enquiry before a court of examination. Com. v. Blakeley, 1 Va. Cas. 129.

Jurisdictional Amount.—A judgment in a district court in an action of assumpsit was arrested upon a verdict for less than $100, because the record did not show that the plaintiff's demand was reduced below $100 by a set-off offered at the trial on the part of the defendant. Maitland v. M'Dearman, 1 Va. Cas. 131.

The special counts in an action of assumpsit claimed less than $100, but the general count claimed $200, and the damages were laid at $500. The jury being unable to agree the case was submitted to arbitration, the award to be the judgment of the court. The award was for less than $100. Held, that the district court had jurisdiction. Neff v. Talbot, 1 Va. Cas. 140.

Judgment of Former Term Final.—A district court has no power or jurisdiction to reverse, alter, or amend a judgment given at the former terms of the state court, which had been entered on the order book, and signed by a judge in open court. Halley v. Baird, 1 H. & M. 25.

Execution of Decrees of Court of Appeals.—It was held in Scott v. Graves, 4 Call 372, that the state district courts were obliged to execute the decrees of the court of appeals, reversing those of the old court of admiralty, after the dissolution of that court by the organization of the government of the United States, in cases in which the former court of admiralty had jurisdiction by law, at the time of passing the "act establishing district courts, and for regulating the general court," and which was not taken away by the constitution of the United States.

XI. GENERAL COURT.

Jurisdictional Amount.—In Tutt v. Freeman, Jefferson 24, it was held that the jurisdiction of the general court did not depend upon the amount of the judgment given, but upon the amount of damages laid in the declaration, if it was for as much as ten pounds sterling.

Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction.—The general court was held in Godwin v. Lunan, Jefferson 96, to be possessed of ecclesiastical jurisdiction in general, and as an ecclesiastical court it had the power to censure or deprive a minister in charge of a church, if there should be sufficient cause.

Jurisdiction to Decide Questions of Law from Superior Court.—The general court has no jurisdiction to consider matters of law certified to it for opinion by the higher court of chancery. Com. v. Hening, 1 Va. Cas. 324.

If a superior court decides upon a question at law in a criminal court, and afterwards refers it to the general court for its opinion, the general court has no jurisdiction to consider the question. Com. v. Hening, 1 Va. Cas. 325. But see M'Cauley's Case, 1 Va. Cas. 271.

Same—Consent of Accused.—If a question of law in a criminal prosecution be adjourned from a circuit superior court to the general court, it must appear by the record, that it was adjourned with the consent of the accused. Com. v. Reynolds, 1 Leigh 663.

Same—Same—Outlawry.—In an indictment against a party who has been proceeded against to outlawry, a question cannot be adjourned to the general court, without his consent appearing in the record. Com. v. Pearce, 6 Gratt. 669.

Same—Regular under Rev. Code.—It was held in Com. v. Nix, 11 Leigh 636, that under 1 Rev. Code, ch. 69, § 14, that it was regular to adjourn questions in a criminal case in regard to the effect of the evidence produced, from the circuit court to the general court and the latter court ought to decide them.

Bail in Murder Case—Concurrent Jurisdiction.—It was held in Com. v. Semmes, 11 Leigh 665, that the general court had original concurrent jurisdiction with the circuit superior court to admit a prisoner to bail for good cause, where he is confined in jail upon an indictment for murder.

Habeas Corpus—Judgment of Oyer and Terminer Court.—A prisoner confined in the penitentiary under the judgment of a court of oyer and terminer, for an offence which said court had no jurisdiction to try, may be discharged by the general court upon a writ of habeas corpus. Cropper v. Com., 2 Rob. 842.

Felonies—Committed beyond Territorial Limits.—By cl. 1, § 7, Act, 1 Rev. Code 1792, ch. 136, all treasons, etc., and other offences against the commonwealth, except piracies and felonies on the high seas, though committed beyond the territorial limits of the state, are indictable and punishable in the general court. Com. v. Gaines, 2 Va. Cas. 172.

Same—Committed on Bays, Rivers, Creeks, etc.—The federal courts of admiralty established under the articles of confederation, had power to try piracies and felonies on the high seas only; the Virginia court of admiralty was excluded from the jurisdiction in all capital cases, and hence it also follows that the general court as one of common law had jurisdiction in 1786, to try all felonies committed on the bay, rivers, creeks, etc. Com. v. Gaines, 2 Va. Cas. 172.

Prior to the Revolution, the commissioners of admiralty appointed under the great seal of England, had jurisdiction to try all treasons, felonies, and piracies committed, not only on the high seas, but on the bays and rivers. Those powers ceased with the revolution. By the act of 1777, the general court was vested with the power of trying those offences within the limits of the commonwealth, on the bay and rivers, as well as on the land. Com. v. Gaines, 2 Va. Cas. 172.

Larceny of Horse in District of Columbia.—Under Act, 1 Rev. Code 1792, ch. 136, § 7, if a citizen of Virginia steal a horse from another citizen in the District of Columbia, he may under said law be indicted, tried, convicted and sentenced in the general court. Com. v. Gaines, 2 Va. Cas. 172.

XII. FEDERAL COURTS.

Decision of Highest State Court Construing Statutes Controls.—The decision of the highest court of a state in the construction of its statutes, and as to the validity or invalidity of contracts dependent only on such statutes, is the controlling rule of decision in federal courts, where there is no federal question. Clarksburg, etc., Co. v. City of Clarksburg, 47 W. Va. 739, 35 S. E. Rep. 994.

Effect of Mandate in State Court.—The court of appeals of Virginia will consider whether a mandate issued by the supreme court of the United States directing it to render a judgment, reversing one which it had pronounced before, be authorized by the constitution or not, and being of opinion such mandate is not so authorized will disobey it. Hunter v. Martin, 4 Munf. 1. See Hunter v. Martin (U. S.), 1 Wheat. 304, and Cohens v. Virginia (U. S.), 6 Wheat. 264, when the United States supreme court overruled the above case.

Right of Foreign Corporation to Resort to Federal Courts.—A state cannot by mere legislative declaration deprive a foreign corporation of its right to resort to the federal courts, in cases where such right is conferred by the constitution and laws of the United States. Rece v. Newport News, etc., Co., 32 W. Va. 164, 9 S. E. Rep. 212.

Suit to Wind Up Bank—Debtor Entitled to Be Sued in State Court.—In a suit in the federal circuit court for the district of Virginia, brought by the citizens of Maryland, against a Virginia bank, to have its assets disbursed, upon the petition of the plaintiffs and upon notice to a debtor of the bank who was a citizen of Virginia, the court rendered judgment against him. It was held that the debtor being a citizen of Virginia, the court had no jurisdiction in the case to render the judgment against him, as he was entitled to be sued in the courts of his own state. Nulton v. Isaacs, 30 Gratt. 726.

Court of Conciliation—Not Obligatory on Party Not Consenting.—The decision of the court of conciliation, established after the war, to adjust disputes during the suspension of the civil authority is not obligatory upon a party who did not consent to its hearing. Myers v. Whitfield, 22 Gratt. 780.

Rule of Practice—Conflict with Act of Congress.—If a rule of practice prescribed to the circuit courts by the supreme court of the United States, is in conflict with an act of congress, the rule is void. Suckley v. Rotchford, 12 Gratt. 60, 65 Am. Dec. 240.

XIII. GENERAL POWER AND JURISDICTION OF STATE COURTS.

1. IN GENERAL.

To Close Streets in Interest of Justice.—By order of a judge of a state court, the street in front of a courthouse is closed with ropes to prevent travel, as the noises occasioned thereby disturb the court, and interfere with the administration of justice. He has power to do so, and the city is not liable for an injury occasioned thereby to a traveler, whose injury is caused by his own imprudence. Belvin v. City of Richmond, 85 Va. 574, 8 S. E. Rep. 378.

No Discretionary Power to Refuse Aid.—A court of law possesses no discretionary power to refuse its aid, out of deference to any supposed policy forbidding the assertion of a stale demand. Hutsonpiller v. Stover, 12 Gratt. 579.

Can Recommend but Not Direct Nonsuit.—It is within the power of the court to recommend a nonsuit, but it cannot direct it to be entered against the will of the plaintiff. Ross v. Gill, 1 Wash. 87. And on motion for a nonsuit it may give its opinion that the plaintiff has no cause of action, or it may refuse its opinion. Thweat v. Finch, 1 Wash. 217.

Guard Execution of Process.—Every court has the power to watch over the execution of its process, and where it has been irregularly, or fraudulently executed, to quash it. Hendricks v. Dundass, 2 Wash. 50.

Cannot Instruct as to Weight of Evidence.—The court has no right to instruct the jury as to the weight of evidence, that being a subject only proper for the decision of that body. Keel v. Herbert, 1 Wash. 203.

Can Decide Admissibility of Evidence.—It is the province of the court to decide on the admissibility of testimony, and of the jury, to decide on its weight. Bogle v. Sullivan, 1 Call 561.

Effect on State Court by Appointment of a Trustee Receiver by Federal Court.—A trustee of a bank in liquidation transfers a note due the bank to one of its creditors. Afterwards an order was made in a suit in a federal court, in which the trustee was a defendant, appointing him receiver in the cause. The transfer being made before the appointment of the trustee as receiver, the state court has jurisdiction of the case. Alexandria, etc., R. Co. v. Burke, 22 Gratt. 254.

2. ABSTRACT QUESTIONS.

Legislature Can Give No Power to Decide.—It is the province of courts to decide what the law is, and determine its application to particular facts in the decision of causes. They cannot be empowered by the legislature to pass upon the constitutionality or validity of a legislative act or city ordinance as a general and abstract question; the question must be whether the act or ordinance furnishes the rule to govern the particular case before the court. Shepherd v. City of Wheeling, 30 W. Va. 479, 4 S. E. Rep. 635.

While a mandamus was pending in the supreme court to determine a petitioner's right to an office, the legislature passed on this right, it was held that the court would not decide an abstract question. Flanagan v. Central Lunatic Asylum, 79 Va. 554.

3. CONTEMPTS.

Inherent Power to Punish.—In the courts of the state created by the constitution there is an inherent power to punish for contempt, which may be regulated, but not destroyed, or so far diminished by legislative enactment as to be rendered ineffectual. This is a power necessary to be exercised by the court itself, and an act which deprives the court of this power by giving its exercise to a jury is unconstitutional. Carter's Case, 96 Va. 791, 33 S. E. Rep. 780; Wells v. Com., 21 Gratt. 503; Dandridge's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 408; State v. McClaugherty, 33 W. Va. 250, 10 S. E. Rep. 407; State v. Frew, 24 W. Va. 416; State v. Hansford, 43 W. Va. 773, 28 S. E. Rep. 792; State v. Irwin, 30 W. Va. 404, 4 S. E. Rep. 413; Elam v. Com., 4 Va. Law Reg. 520.

4. PATENTS.

Contract Concerning Patent Rights—Validity Arising Collaterally.—The state courts have jurisdiction over questions arising out of contracts made concerning patent rights, where the validity of the patent arises collaterally, and is not directly involved. Hotchkiss v. Fitzgerald, etc., Co., 41 W. Va. 357, 23 S. E. Rep. 576.

When the validity of a patent right is directly adjudicated, it is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal courts, yet a cause of action may relate to the subject-matter of the patent right which does not involve directly the validity of it, then it is within the jurisdiction of the state court. Maurice v. Devol, 23 W. Va. 247.

5. WHEN STATE IS INTERESTED.

Suits by Commonwealth.—Except when it is otherwise specially provided, any of the courts have jurisdiction over suits by the commonwealth, in cases in which other parties may prosecute like suits. See ch. 166, Code Va. 1873; Com. v. Ford, 29 Gratt. 688.

Suits against Agents of Government.—The true owner of property, found in possession of agents or officers of the government under a void title, may bring an action against such agents and officers for its recovery, and it is no answer to say that the state has an interest in or claim to the property. In such cases jurisdiction is neither given nor ousted by the relative situation of the parties concerned in interest, but by the relative situation of the parties named on the record. Board of Public Works v. Gannt, 76 Va. 455. See full discussion of this question by CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL in Osborn v. U. S. Bank, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 738, 856.

6. OVER FEDERAL AFFAIRS.

Execution of Decree of Federal Court.—A state court has no jurisdiction to enjoin the execution of a decree of a federal court. Dorr v. Rohr, 82 Va. 350.

Offences by Acts of Congress.—The courts of this commonwealth have no jurisdiction to try offences created by acts of congress. Com. v. Feely, 1 Va. Cas. 321.

Penal Laws of Congress.—The penal laws of congress cannot be enforced in the state courts, as they do not have any of the judicial powers of the United States. Jackson v. Rose, 2 Va. Cas. 34.

Judicial Power of the United States.—By the constitution, the judicial power of the United States is vested in the supreme court, and inferior courts to be ordained and established by congress. Therefore state courts have no right to exercise that judicial power. Jackson v. Rose, 2 Va. Cas. 34.

State Constitution in Violation of United States Constitution.—A state court has jurisdiction to decide that a provision in the constitution of the state is in violation of the constitution of the United States. The Homestead Cases, 22 Gratt. 266.

Federal Officers Cannot Be Garnished in Federal Property.—Where the land on which a federal corporation has its buildings was purchased by the United States with consent of the state legislature, it is under the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal government. A state court cannot attach or garnish funds in the hands of its officers. Foley v. Shriver, 81 Va. 568.

7. EFFECT OF BANKRUPT PROCEEDINGS.—See monographic note on "Bankruptcy and Insolvency" appended to Dillard v. Collins, 25 Gratt. 348.

Liens Prior to Petition—Enforcement in State Court.—Where judgments were rendered and docketed, and liens acquired, against a debtor before he filed his petition in bankruptcy, and before his homestead right existed, it was competent for the judgment-lien creditors to seek enforcement in a state court, as the plaintiffs were not parties to the bankrupt proceedings, and no question was raised there as to the liens on the land allotted as a homestead. McAllister v. Bodkin, 76 Va. 809. See Spilman v. Johnson, 27 Gratt. 38; Ferrell v. Madigan, 76 Va. 195.

A state court has jurisdiction to enforce a lien against the land of a debtor, but for a proceeding in bankruptcy, and if that jurisdiction is not ousted by the interference of the bankrupt court, the state court may lawfully proceed to enforce the lien. Beall v. Walker, 26 W. Va. 741.

When a bankrupt court orders property sold subject to its liens thereon, there is no reason why a state court should not proceed to enforce the lien. Beall v. Walker, 26 W. Va. 741.

Where neither a bankrupt court, the assignee nor any creditor objects, a state court has jurisdiction to proceed with a suit to enforce prior liens on the property assigned. Beall v. Walker, 26 W. Va. 741.

Lien Creditor May Decline to Appear in Bankrupt Court.—A lien creditor of a bankrupt may either decline to appear in the bankrupt court, or he may proceed there to establish his debt, and rely upon his security. But if he takes an active part in those proceedings, he cannot afterwards go in a state court to satisfy his judgment. Spilman v. Johnson, 27 Gratt. 38.

Jurisdiction of State Court Not Ousted by Defendant's Going in Bankruptcy.—When a state court has possession of a case, and makes a decree therein, its jurisdiction cannot be ousted by the defendant's going in bankruptcy; he can only proceed in the state court to protect his rights. Barr v. White, 20 Gratt. 531.

Same—Creditors' Suit.—After a creditors' suit has been brought in a state court, its jurisdiction over the parties cannot be ousted by the defendant going into bankruptcy and being adjudged a bankrupt by a federal court. Sively v. Campbell, 23 Gratt. 898.

Same—Lien Creditor Not a Party—Effect of Notice to Creditors and Proof of Debt.—The jurisdiction of a state court to enforce a lien, in which suit the lien debtor is made a party and defends, is not divested by subsequent proceedings by him in bankruptcy, to which the lien creditor is not made a party, the assignee not becoming a party to the suit in the state court; and the creditor does not become a party to the bankruptcy proceedings because of notice to creditors to prove their debts, nor does he by proving his debts. The rule is that the court that first takes jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter retains it. Francisco v. Shelton, 85 Va. 779, 8 S. E. Rep. 789.

Bankrupt Court Has No Jurisdiction over Lands Conveyed Prior to Adjudgment.—A bankrupt court has jurisdiction over all the property of a bankrupt, including that which has been conveyed by him in fraud of his creditors or in fraud of the law. But it has no jurisdiction over land which has been ~~conveyed~~ conveyed before he was adjudged a bankrupt, and the state court has jurisdiction over such aliened lands at the suit of a creditor. Parker v. Dillard, 75 Va. 418.

Bankrupt Act 1841—Fraudulent Conveyance Prior to Petition.—Under the bankrupt act, August 19, 1841, it was held that creditors who had not proved their debts in bankruptcy, might institute suits to set aside fraudulent conveyances of their debtor before he filed his petition in bankruptcy, and might impeach his discharge on the ground of fraud or concealment of property, contrary to the provisions of the act, and that such suit might be instituted in any court, state or federal, in which independent of the act, a suit may be properly brought against the bankrupt. Tichenor v. Allen, 13 Gratt. 15; Beall v. Walker, 26 W. Va. 746.

December, 1843.

Penitentiary Convict—Former Conviction—Continuance.—A report being made to the circuit court of Henrico by the superintendent of the penitentiary, pursuant to the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 171, § 16, that a convict received into the penitentiary is the same person mentioned in the record of a former conviction, and that he has not been sentenced to the punishment prescribed by law for his second offence, the court continues the case at several successive terms, in the absence and without the consent of the convict; after which he is brought into court for the first time, and his identity being duly ascertained, he is sentenced to the proper punishment of his second offence: HELD, such continuance of the case furnishes no ground of objection to the judgment.

Same—Same—Jurors—Peremptory Challenge.—Upon an enquiry, in pursuance of the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 171, § 16, whether a convict received into the penitentiary be the same person mentioned in the record of a former conviction, the prisoner has no right to challenge peremptorily any person called as a juror.

On the 18th of April 1829, Elijah W. Brooks, having been convicted, in the superior court of law for Rockbridge county, of murder in the second degree, was sentenced by the court to imprisonment in the penitentiary for twelve years, the period ascertained by the jury in their verdict.

On the 28th of May 1842, Elijah Anderson, having been convicted, in the circuit superior court of law and chancery for Kanawha county, of grand larceny, was sentenced by that court to imprisonment in the penitentiary for two years, the period ascertained by the jury in their verdict.

On the 22d of July 1842, Charles S. Morgan, superintendent of the penitentiary, made a report to the circuit superior court for the county of Henrico and city of Richmond, setting forth, that Elijah W. Brooks, mentioned in the record of the first conviction, was one and the same person with Elijah Anderson, mentioned in the record of the second conviction; that it appeared, *from the face of the record of the last trial and sentence, that the said Elijah W. Brooks, alias Elijah Anderson, had not been sentenced to the punishment prescribed by law for his second offence aforesaid; and that he was now in the custody of the said superintendent, ready to be proceeded against according to law.‡

§The proceedings in this case were had in pursuance of the 16th section of the penitentiary law, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 171, p. 619, 20, which provides, that "whenever any person shall be received into the said jail and penitentiary house, having been a second or third time convicted and sentenced to confinement therein, and it shall appear upon the face of the record of the last trial and conviction, that such person hath not been sentenced to the punishment above prescribed for such second or third conviction, and that the question of such former conviction or convictions hath not been made and decided on such last trial; it shall be the duty of the keeper of such jail and penitentiary house to give information, without delay, to the superior court of law for Henrico county, that such person 847 *Whereupon, on the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, it was ordered that the case be continued till the next term to be holden for the trial of criminal causes.

No other proceeding was had in the case until the 25th of April 1843; when, at the instance of the attorney for the commonwealth, and for reasons appearing to the court, the case was again continued till the next term to be holden for the trial of criminal causes.

On the 4th of November 1843, the prisoner was brought into court by the superintendent of the penitentiary; whereupon the attorney for the commonwealth filed an information against him, setting forth the proceedings and conviction had for each of the offences aforesaid, and charging that the said Elijah W. Brooks, alias Elijah Anderson, is the same identical person mentioned in each of the several records; that he has not been sentenced to the punishment by law prescribed for his said second offence; and that the question of his former conviction before the superior court of Rockbridge was not made and decided on his last trial before the circuit superior court of Kanawha. The prisoner being thereupon required to say whether he is the same person mentioned in each of the records of conviction in the information set forth, or not, pleaded that he is not the same person so mentioned in each of the said records. A jury of bystanders being then impaneled and sworn to try the quesso convicted hath been received. It shall thereupon be the duty of such court, at the same term, by warrant directed to the said keeper, to cause such convict to be brought before the court; and, upon an information filed, setting forth the several records of conviction, and alleging such convict to be the same identical person mentioned in each, such convict shall be required to say whether he is the same person so mentioned in each of the said records or not; if he plead that he is not, or remain silent and will not plead at all, his plea or his silence shall be entered of record; and thereupon a jury of bystanders shall be impaneled and sworn to enquire and say, whether such convict be or be not the same identical person mentioned in each of the said records of conviction. If, upon such enquiry, the jury find that such convict is not the person mentioned in the records as aforesaid, he shall be remanded to the said jail and penitentiary house, to be confined as if he had not been removed as aforesaid; but if the said jury shall find that the said convict is the same person mentioned in the said records of conviction, or if the said convict, in open court, shall acknowledge, after being duly cautioned, that he is the same person mentioned as aforesaid, then the said superior court of law shall pronounce sentence upon the said convict, of confinement in the said jail and penitentiary house as is herein provided; and such sentence shall be executed, as all other like sentences of the said court. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to inhibit the said superior court of law from granting continuances of any case so brought before them." —Note in Original Edition.

tion of identity, found that the said Elijah W. Brooks, alias Elijah Anderson, was the same identical person mentioned in each of the said records of conviction; and they ascertained the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary to be fourteen years and ten months, to commence from the 15th of June 1842.

At the trial, Henry A. Holmes, a bystander, being called and about to be sworn as a juror, the prisoner offered to challenge him peremptorily; but the court 848 *refused the prisoner the right of peremptory challenge, and put him to his challenge for cause: to which opinion he excepted.

Being brought into court on a subsequent day of the term to receive his sentence, the prisoner prayed the court to arrest judgment on the verdict aforesaid, for the following reasons: "Because he says it will appear from an inspection of the record in this cause, that he has not had, as by law he ought to have had, a trial of the issue made up on the information aforesaid, without delay, as is required by the provisions of the act. Because it appears by the record in this cause, that before any notice had been given to the said prisoner, without any warrant issued, before his arraignment or appearance in court by counsel or in person, on Friday July 22d 1842, the superintendent of the public jail and penitentiary house made a report in writing to this court, stating that the prisoner had been received into the said jail and penitentiary house, having been a second time convicted and sentenced to confinement therein; and on the same day and year last aforesaid, on the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, this court ordered this cause to be continued until the next term thereafter to be holden for the trial of criminal causes; the said prisoner having had no notice whatever of any proceedings theretofore had against him, nor of the said motion for a continuance of his said cause. And the said prisoner further saith, that it appears from the record in this cause, that on Tuesday the 25th day of April 1843, his said case was, on the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth and for reasons appearing to the court, continued till the next term thereafter to be holden for the trial of criminal causes; which said continuance was had and ordered in the absence of the said prisoner, before his arraignment, without any warrant having been issued to bring him into court. And it does 849 not appear that *in this cause any warrant has ever been issued, or any notice given the said prisoner of the pending prosecution, before the present term of the court, at which for the first time he has been arraigned to plead to the information aforesaid; so that, in this indirect way, great delay has been operated in bringing on the trial of the issue made in this cause, without his knowledge or consent."

After argument of the errors filed in arrest of judgment, the court overruled the same, and pronounced sentence against the prisoner according to the verdict.

He now applied by petition to the general court for a writ of error to the judgment.

Munford for the petitioner.

SMITH, J., delivered the opinion of the court.—The petitioner assigns two errors, as cause to entitle him to a reversal of the judgment of the circuit court: 1st. that the case was continued by the circuit court in his absence and without his consent; 2. that he was denied the right of peremptory challenge to the jurors sworn to enquire whether he was the same identical person mentioned in the several records of conviction.

As to the first point it may be remarked, that it is only where a party is ruled into trial improperly, that an error of the court in deciding on a motion for a continuance can be corrected by a superior court. If the error be in continuing the case improperly, the only effect of it is the delay of the case: it is not a discontinuance; nor could it be a good reason for setting aside a judgment at a subsequent term, when a full and fair trial had been given to the prisoner. This objection, therefore, affords no ground for reversal of the judgment.

As to the second point, it will be found that at common law a peremptory challenge is not allowed in any 850 *case except upon the plea of not guilty, and no peremptory challenges are ever allowed on the trial of collateral issues. So we find it stated by the elementary writers: see 1 Chitty's C. L. 535; 3 Bac. Abr. Juries, E. 9, p. 762. The case of The king v. Radcliffe, 1 W. Black. 6, may also be referred to as precisely similar to this case. The prisoner had been convicted of high treason; and upon a collateral issue, that he was not the same person, a peremptory challenge was insisted upon, which was refused by Lee, C. J. Other cases might be referred to; but it is deemed unnecessary. It seems very clear that there was no error in the decision of the circuit court upon this point.

The writ of error is therefore refused.

PENITENTIARY.

Guaranties in Bill of Rights Not Applicable to Convicts.—The guaranties included in the bill of rights have reference to freemen, and are not applicable to persons convicted of crime and confined in the state penitentiary. A convicted felon has only such rights as the statutes may give him. Ruffin v. Com., 21 Gratt. 790. See monographic note on "Constitutional Law" appended to Com. v. Adcock, 8 Gratt. 661.

Offences Committed by Convicts—Where Triable.—A person convicted of felony and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary, is, until the time of his imprisonment has expired or he has been pardoned, in contemplation of law, in the penitentiary, though he may have been hired out to work on a railroad, or the like, in a distant county; and the law relating to convicts in the penitentiary still applies to him. Thus in a case in which a convict was hired to work on a railroad in Bath county, and in attempting to escape he killed the man placed by the contractor to guard him, it was held that he might be tried before the circuit court of the city of Richmond, and by a jury summoned from that city. Ruffin v. Com., 21 Gratt. 790.

Proceedings against Escaped Convicts.—The proceedings against an escaped convict must be by indictment. Com. v. Ryan, 2 Va. Cas. 467 (1824).

Punishment for Escaped Convicts.—The punishment for convicts escaping from the penitentiary is prescribed by § 54 of the penitentiary act. The punishment consists in such additional confinement and hard labor, and such additional corporal punishment, not extending to life and limb, as the court before whom such person shall be convicted of such escape shall, in the exercise of a sound discretion, adjudge and direct. Com. v. Ryan, 2 Va. Cas. 467.

Proceedings to Sentence Convicts for Increased Punishment for Second Offence.—Sections 4179, 4182, Va. Code 1887, provide that if a person sentenced to the penitentiary and received therein shall have been before sentenced to like punishment, and the record of his conviction does not show that he was sentenced under §§ 3905, 3906, requiring sentence for an increased term in such case, the superintendent of the penitentiary shall file an information in the circuit court of Richmond to require the convict to say whether he is the person formerly convicted and sentenced; and if he remain silent, or deny such identity, a jury of bystanders shall be summoned to try the issue thus raised, and upon a verdict against him the prisoner shall be sentenced to such further confinement as is prescribed by chapter 190. Such provisions are constitutional, as the prisoner is not in the position of one charged with crime in the first instance, with all the presumptions of law in favor of his innocence, and a writ of habeas corpus asking for his discharge from such additional punishment will be denied. King v. Lynn, 90 Va. 345, 18 S. E. Rep. 439.

Upon an inquiry, in pursuance of the statute (1 Rev. Code, ch. 171, § 16), whether a convict received in the penitentiary be the same person mentioned in the record of the former conviction, the prisoner has no right to challenge peremptorily any person called as a juror. Brooks v. Com., 2 Rob. 845.

Same—Continuance in Absence of Convict Does Not Invalidate Judgment.—Where a report was made to the circuit court of Henrico by the superintendent of a penitentiary, pursuant to the statute (1 Rev. Code, ch. 171, § 16), that a convict received into the penitentiary was the same person mentioned in the record of a former conviction, and that he had not been sentenced to the punishment prescribed by law for the second offence, and the court continued the case at several successive terms, in the absence and without the consent of the convict, after which he was brought into court and sentenced to proper punishment for his second offence, it was held, that such continuance of the case furnished no grounds of objections to the judgment. Brooks v. Com., 2 Rob. 845.

Same—Sentence to Solitary Cells.—A convict in the penitentiary, against whom an information is filed in superior court of law for Henrico, under § 16 of the penitentiary act, charged with having been received a second time into that prison for a second offence, may, on being identified either by verdict or by confession, be sentenced by the court to a portion of confinement in the solitary cells. Com. v. Bryant, 2 Va. Cas. 465 (1824).

Convict Working on Road—Liability of County for His Torts.—An action cannot be maintained against a county for personal injuries, caused by the negligence of a convict of the state penitentiary, while working on a public road under the direction of the county, because the county, being a part of the sovereign power, cannot be sued in the absence of a statute giving right to sue in such case. Fry v. County of Albemarle, 86 Va. 195, 9 S. E. Rep. 1004.

Liability of Present Government for Purchases by Penitentiary Agent of Richmond Government.—Where the store-keeper of the penitentiary, elected prior to 1861, purchased leather to be manufactured by the convicts in the penitentiary—the store-keeper and the seller both recognizing the authority of the Richmond government—it was held that the seller, not having been able to obtain payment from the Richmond authorities, could not recover from the present government of Virginia in a suit instituted in 1866. Com. v. Chalkley, 20 Gratt. 404. See also, De Rothschilds v. Auditor, 22 Gratt. 41.

Liability of Sureties of Agent for Debts Contracted with His Predecessors.—By § 57, ch. 206, Code 1873, it is provided that the general agent of the penitentiary and his sureties shall be responsible for the amount of all debts for goods or work contracted with him on his authority, and for all money received by him as such agent, except as therein provided. There is no law making it a part of his duty to collect debts contracted with his predecessors, and moneys so collected are not covered by his bond, and are not chargeable to his sureties. Loving v. Auditor, 76 Va. 942.

Funds Received by Agent in Excess of Appropriations—Sureties Not Liable.—The constitution of Virginia (art. 10, § 10) declares that no money shall be paid out of the treasury except in pursuance of appropriations by law. Where the general agent of the penitentiary receives $12,500 pursuant to appropriations made before or after receipts, and $5,000 in excess of appropriations, the sureties are liable for the first, but not for the last, sum. Loving v. Auditor, 76 Va. 942.

Purchases by Penitentiary Agent—Liability of Sureties.—Where the general agent of the penitentiary buys raw material for the state and gives therefor his note signed by himself with the letters "G. A." (meaning general agent) appended, but the state assumes the liability and pays the notes, the general agent and sureties are entitled to no credit therefor, as for material purchased on his individual responsibilities. Loving v. Auditor, 76 Va. 942.

Statutory Provisions in Regard to Signing Drafts Drawn by Penitentiary Agent.—If, by the provisions of the Code 1873, ch. 206, § 58, the legislature intended all drafts drawn by the general agent of the penitentiary to be certified by the superintendent and countersigned by the governor, a failure to certify and countersign the drafts does not affect the liabilities of the sureties for money so drawn and received by him. These provisions are merely directory to such officers, and form no part of the contract with the sureties. Loving v. Auditor, 76 Va. 942.

Reduction of Compensation of Penitentiary Agent—Statute.—The legislature having reduced the salary of the general agent of the penitentiary, he and his sureties are entitled to credit for the reduced compensation, and not for the compensation at the rates allowed by law in force at the dates of the official bonds. But as by act, which became law July 1, 1878, the legislature restored the compensation as allowed by Code 1873, ch. 18, § 23, credit must be allowed after that date at the original rates. Loving v. Auditor, 76 Va. 942.

Misappropriation of Private Funds by Penitentiary Agent.—Where the agent of a penitentiary receives funds from private parties for the purpose of building a chapel for convicts, his sureties are not chargeable for a misapplication of these funds. Loving v. Auditor, 76 Va. 942.

IDENTITY.

I. Identity of Names.

1. Presumption from Identity of Names.
2. Difference in Mode of Spelling Names.

II. Identity of Accused in Criminal Cases.

1. Must Be Established.
2. Examining Person or Garments of Accused.
3. Opinion Evidence.
4. Hearsay Evidence.
5. Burden of Proof.

III. Identity of Persons Making Admissions.

I. IDENTITY OF NAMES.

1. PRESUMPTION FROM IDENTITY OF NAMES.

—From the fact that the names of two persons are the same, the presumption of the identity of the persons will arise. Thus in a case in which the names of the plaintiff and of the defendant appeared from the record to be identical, the court held that this was sufficient to raise the presumption that the same person was both plaintiff and defendant in the case. Sweetland v. Porter, 43 W. Va. 189, 27 S. E. Rep. 352. In another case in which the name of the trustee in a deed of trust and that of the notary public, who took the acknowledgment, were the same, it was held that the presumption that they were the same person would have in some way to be rebutted or denied in order for the acknowledgment to be valid. Tavener v. Barrett, 21 W. Va. 656.

2. DIFFERENCE IN MODE OF SPELLING NAMES.—In identity cases the courts attach but little importance to the concurrence or difference in the mode of spelling a name. Thus in a case in which the heirs of a Scotchman, who died in Virginia, were seeking to establish their identity, and their claim to the estate, the court said: "Much reliance has been placed upon the different spelling of the name. We should attach but little importance to the dropping of a single letter in the spelling of the name were the spelling uniform in one way in Virginia, and uniform the other way in Scotland. Such changes are too common to be of much weight in questions like that before us. But the spelling of the name in this case is not uniform in either country. * * * The diversity in the spelling of the name existed in both countries, and no importance should be attached to it." Adie v. Com., 25 Gratt. 712.

II. IDENTITY OF ACCUSED IN CRIMINAL CASES.

1. MUST BE ESTABLISHED.—The question of identity is presented in every criminal prosecution. That is, it devolves upon the commonwealth to show that the accused is the person who committed the crime. This it may do in several ways, the simplest of which is by the testimony of persons who saw the crime committed. It is most frequently done, however, by the means of circumstantial evidence. For example, where it is shown that a crime has been committed by the use of certain tools and instruments, it is always pertinent to show, as one element connecting the accused with the crime charged, that he possessed such tools and instruments. Nicholas v. Com., 91 Va. 741, 21 S. E. Rep. 364; McBride v. Com., 95 Va. 818, 30 S. E. Rep. 454.

But the mere failure of the evidence to disclose any other criminal agent than the person accused is not a circumstance which may be considered by the jury in determining whether he is or is not the person who committed the crime; for the prisoner is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is established and he is not to be prejudiced by the inability of the commonwealth to point out any other criminal agent. McBride v. Com., 95 Va. 818, 30 S. E. Rep. 454. See also, Smith v. Com., 21 Gratt. 809; monographic note on "Homicide" appended to Souther v. Com., 7 Gratt. 673.

2. EXAMINING PERSON OR GARMENTS OF ACCUSED.—While the defendant in a criminal case cannot be compelled to connect himself with the crime by act or words, by the better doctrine he, or his garments, may be examined for evidence of the crime. Thus in State v. Baker, 33 W. Va. 319, 10 S. E. Rep. 689, it was held proper for the jury to take into consideration the fact that the trousers of the accused, which had been delivered to the sheriff by the prisoner without objection, contained blood stains. See monographic note on "Constitutional Law" appended to Adcock v. Com., 8 Gratt. 661.

3. OPINION EVIDENCE.—A witness who testifies that he knows the person in question may be asked his belief as to the identity of such person. It is not a case of expert testimony, but depends upon the observation and knowledge of the particular witness in the given case, to go to the jury for what it is worth, no matter what his science, skill or experience may be in identifying persons. Indeed it is the constant practice to receive in evidence the belief of any witness as to the identity of a person, provided he has any knowledge of such person. State v. Harr, 38 W. Va. 58, 17 S. E. Rep. 794; Hopper v. Com., 6 Gratt. 684, and foot-note.

4. HEARSAY EVIDENCE.—It is generally held that hearsay evidence is inadmissible in order to establish the identity of a person; and in criminal cases it is well settled that hearsay evidence is inadmissible to show that the accused is the person who committed the crime. Hence statements of the deceased made on the day before the homicide, to a third person in the absence of the prisoner, as to where deceased was then going, are irrelevant and should not be received. McBride v. Com., 95 Va. 818, 30 S. E. Rep. 454.

The court, in applying this rule in a criminal case, held that a witness who identified a certain piece of wearing apparel would not be allowed to repeat what he had heard, as confirming his statement. Hopper v. Com., 6 Gratt. 684.

5. BURDEN OF PROOF.—The burden of proving the identity of the accused rests upon the commonwealth, and the court should instruct the jury, if the accused so requests, that the identity of the accused with the perpetrator of the offense should be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. To refuse such instruction and to give in lieu thereof one which is calculated to create the impression upon the minds of the jury that the identity of the accused with the perpetrator of the crime may be established by a lesser degree of proof is reversible error. Waller v. Com., 84 Va. 492, 5 S. E. Rep. 364.

III. IDENTITY OF PERSONS MAKING ADMISSIONS.

In George v. Pilcher, 28 Gratt. 299, the deposition of a witness, since deceased, was offered, whereby it was sought to show that one of the defendants, in the presence of the other, had, in an interview at Richmond, made to the witness certain admissions material to the issue. These defendants were strangers to the witness, and upon cross-examination describing them he said: "They were not black negroes. I think the brother-in-law had the lightest skin of the two. I think they were not bright mulattoes, but dark mulattoes." It was proved by other witnesses that the brother-in-law spoken of was a white man, and that the other was so bright that he could hardly be distinguished from a white man. It was further proved that about the time when the witness said he had the interview with the two men they were both in the city inquiring for him. Upon an objection to the reading of the deposition on the ground that the witness did not sufficiently identify the persons whose admissions were sought to be proved by him, it was held that the evidence was prima facie sufficient to authorize the deposition to go to the jury.

ABATEMENT.

1. Within what time the plea of several tenancy should be pleaded in a writ of right. Walkers v. Boaz & others, 485
2. Nonjoinder of a demandant in a writ of right must be pleaded in abatement. See Writ of right No. 2, and S. C., 485
3. Matter of abatement either shews the action to be abatable, or that it is de facto abated. The former usually exists at the time of the suit; the latter for the most part occurs during its progress. The first must be pleaded in technical form, and at a proper stage of the cause. The last may be, but need not be, pleaded; and when apparent, or made known to the court, will be declared by its order in any stage of the suit. ANSWER.

- I. Bringing in defendant.
 1. Case in which a defendant was brought in by a messenger to answer interrogatories. Johns v. Davis's ex'or and others, 729
- II. Weight of answer as evidence.
 2. It is a rule in equity that the answer of a defendant denying the allegations of the bill must be taken as true unless disproved by two witnesses, or by one witness and circumstances in his support: it is not in the power of a plaintiff to make his case an exception to this rule by stating in his bill that he expects to prove its allegations, and disclaiming a discovery from the defendant.
Thornton v. Gordon &c., 719
 3. A bill is filed to enjoin the sale of property conveyed to secure a debt alleged to be usurious, and the plaintiff avers that he expects to make full proof of his allegations, and disclaims all benefit of any discovery from the defendant. The injunction is awarded. But afterwards the defendant files an answer denying the allegation of the bill. And the plaintiff relies on the testimony of a single witness, unsustained by any corroborating circumstances: held, the injunction must be dissolved and the bill dismissed.

5. When objection that sheriff is no party to bill for satisfaction out of insolvent's estate will not avail in appellate court. See Codefendants No. 2, and S. C., 590

IV. Reversal.

6. A decree being rendered against the sureties of an executor, and the appellate court being of opinion that they are not liable, decree reversed and bill dismissed as to all of them, although only one had appealed. But though a sum, (less than 100 dollars) was erroneously decreed against a succeeding administrator, as to whom the bill ought to have been dismissed, yet he not having appealed, no correction was made by the appellate court in this part of the decree, the appellant being in no wise interested therein.

8. Case in which it was considered in the appellate court, that a guardian, who had been culpably in default in failing to render any account of his receipts or disbursements,

853 was allowed by the court below more for *the board and clothing of his ward than he was entitled to; but as a particular sum payable by the ward had not been charged in the court below, it was deemed best to consider that as an equivalent for the excess of the charge for board and clothing, and (saving the parties the delay and expense of restating the guardian's account) to terminate the case by affirming the decree.

ASSIGNMENT.

I. Evidence of consideration.

1. A share of the proceeds of a testator's estate being bequeathed to a feme covert, and her husband having assigned the same, a bill is filed by the assignee, which alleges that the assignment was in consideration of 1500 dollars. The executor and the feme both answer, but the answers do not deny the consideration, or call for proof of it; and the deed of assignment purports on its face to be in consideration of 1500 dollars. It seems, there being no such denial or call for proof, the deed is prima facie evidence of the allegation in the bill. Accord. Scott & wife &c. v. Gibbon & co. &c., 5 Munf. 86.

AWARD.

I. What submission is binding and entitles to specific execution of award.

1. An equitable title to land of which an intestate died seized being set up 854 *against his heirs, some of the heirs and the claimants enter into an agreement under seal, referring the matter to arbitration, and the arbitrators award in favour of the claimants, and direct a conveyance by the heirs of their interest in the land to the claimants: held, it was competent for the adult heirs who were sui juris to enter into the submission, notwithstanding there were other heirs interested in the subject who were not parties; that the award made in pursuance of such submission is binding on the parties to such submission, according to the terms thereof; and that, upon a bill in equity for the purpose, specific execution may be decreed against such parties to the submission, and a conveyance compelled of such legal title to the land as has descended to them respectively. Accord. Smith and others v. Smith &c., 4 Rand. 95.

Boyd's heirs v. Magruder's heirs, 761

II. Specific execution in part.

2. Such decree will be without prejudice to the right of the plaintiffs to proceed at law for a failure to comply with the submission and award in any other respect.

BAIL.

What is no ground for letting to bail.

A prisoner having been examined by the county court and remanded for trial for the offence of feloniously passing two counterfeit half eagles, one of them to J. C. and the other to W. M., two indictments are found against him, in one of which he is charged with passing one of the counterfeit coins to

J. C. on the 13th of October 1842, in the other with passing the other coin to W. M. on the same day. Upon a trial of one of the indictments, the jury find the prisoner not guilty: held, his acquittal in that case does not entitle him to be let to bail in the other. Summerfield v. Commonwealth, 767

BANKS.

When not entitled to credit with commonwealth for premium on specie.

The banks of this commonwealth in which the public moneys were on deposit, paid the interest falling due in January 1840 upon public loans, in specie or its equivalent. Under the proviso to the second section of the act of March 28, 1838, (Sess. Acts of 1838, p. 27, ch. 13,) they claimed credit in account with the commonwealth for the premium which they had to pay to the public creditors for the then difference between specie and the notes of the banks: held, 1. That under the acts in 2 R. C. of 1819, ch. 174, § 6, p. 2, and in Sess. Acts of 1838, p. 27, ch. 14, the claim of any bank for such premium may properly be presented to the first auditor. 2. That upon the disallowance of such claim, the bank may file a petition for redress to the court of chancery for Henrico and Richmond, created by the act of March 13, 1841, in Sess. Acts of 1840-41, p. 65, ch. 48. 3. That according to the true construction and effect of the act of December 11, 1839, in Sess. Acts of 1839-40, p. 52, ch. 63, (especially of the first proviso thereto) the claim of any bank for the premium so paid must be disallowed; dissentiente Brooke, J., on the last point.

3. In an action of debt brought in 1837 by an administrator against an executor, upon a bond of the 10th of January 1833, payable the first of January 1834, the defendant offered as a setoff a bond of the plaintiff's intestate to the defendant's testator, dated the 5th of April 1820 and payable on demand, with two endorsements thereon, admitted by the plaintiff to be in the handwriting of the defendant's testator, one of which credited a sum paid in part on the 855 *first of June 1828, and the other credited another payment in part on the 5th of May 1829. The circuit court, at the instance of the plaintiff, instructed the jury, that after the lapse of 16 years from the date of the said bond, the jury might, from this aided by other circumstances, presume it paid; and, at the instance of the defendant, instructed the jury, that such presumption of payment might be repelled by other circumstances. The defendant relying upon the endorsements aforesaid upon the bond, and there being no proof of the time at which they were made, except that it appeared the defendant's testator died in 1833, the circuit court, at the instance of the plaintiff, instructed the jury, that the said endorsements were not circumstances to be taken into consideration by the jury to repel the presumption: held, as the endorsements must have been made within the period of about 13 years from the time the bond was due, the circuit court clearly erred in its last instruction. II. Discharge of trust deed.

2. A slave conveyed by a deed of trust is sold, in the absence of the trustee, by the debtor with the concurrence of the trust creditor, to another creditor not secured by the deed, for a consideration compounded of the balance remaining due upon the trust, other debts claimed by the trust creditor, and a debt due to the purchasing creditor: held, that by this arrangement the trust deed was discharged, and the title of the trustee, so far as concerns the personal property embraced in the deed, divested; for in a conveyance of chattels personal the law disregards mere formalities of the instrument, and the payment of the debt secured thereupon completely extinguishes the incumbrance. Tavener v. Robinson, 280

CODEFENDANTS.

I. Answer of one no evidence against another.

- I. It is a general rule, that the answer of one defendant in chancery is not evidence against his codefendant. From this rule there is no exception of the answer of an assignor; not even though the bond assigned be alleged to have been given on a gaming consideration. The fact of its being on such consideration cannot be established against a defendant who is the assignee, by the answer of his codefendant the obligee and assignor. Accord. Hoomes v. Smock, 1 Wash. 389; Dade's adm'r v. Madison, 5 Leigh 401.

Pettit v. Jennings &c., 676

II. Decree against one in favour of another.

2. A party having covenanted to pay a sum of money in trust for the benefit of the covenantee and his wife and children, the covenantee afterwards takes the oath of insolvency, and transfers to the sheriff, for the benefit of the creditor, his interest under the covenant. Upon a bill by the creditor against the covenantor, the covenantee, and the wife and children of the latter, (the sheriff not being made a party), the court decrees that the covenantor pay to a trustee, appointed by consent of the other defendants and the plaintiff, the money secured by the covenant, and directs the trustee to 856 invest the *same, and out of the interest pay the plaintiff the amount of his debt. From this decree the covenantor alone appeals: held, 1. The objection that the sheriff was no party to the suit, not having been taken in the court below, cannot be made a ground in the appellate court for reversing the decree. 2. The decree was properly rendered in favour of the codefendants of the covenantor, as well as in favour of the plaintiff. 3. The appellant, being bound by his covenant to pay the money has no interest in the question how it shall be applied, and therefore is not entitled to make the objection that the fund secured by the covenant was not liable to the creditor of the covenantee.

CONSTABLES.

Effect of constable's receipt as evidence.

In an action against a constable and the sureties in his official bond, for failing to pay over debts entrusted to the constable and received by him from the debtors, the receipt of the constable for the debts, signed in his official character, is, according to the true construction of the act passed March 8, 1826, concerning constables and their securities, prima facie evidence, as well against the sureties as against the constable, of the receipt of the money; provided six months have elapsed between the date of the receipt and the commencement of the action. Per Allen and Baldwin, J. But the fact that the receipt of the constable was signed in his official character, must appear in some way on the face of the paper itself; if it do not, the party claiming under the receipt cannot obtain the benefit of the act by oral testimony of the character in which the receipt was signed. CORPORATION.

I. Effect of extinction of corporation plaintiff; and what judgment estops from alleging previous extinction.

1. If a corporation become extinct by the expiration of the term of its corporate existence, pending a suit at law for a corporate demand, and that fact be brought regularly before the court in which the suit is pending, the action must terminate. It is equally clear that if, after judgment in favour of a corporation, the corporation becomes extinct by the expiration of the term of existence granted by the charter, no execution on such judgment can regularly be sued out in the name of the corporation, and if one be sued out, it is liable to be quashed, on shewing the fact of the extinction of the corporation before the emanation of the execution. On the other hand, if an original judgment be rendered in favour of a corporation, as it could not be regularly rendered unless the existence of the corporation continued, the necessary intendment from the rendition of it is, that the continued existence of the corporation was either proved or admitted; and if execution be sued out on the judgment, the defendant, being by this intendment estopped to deny the existence at the time of the judgment, would not, on a motion to quash the execution, be admitted to controvert this intendment, and proof on such motion of the extinction of the corporation before judgment, would be inadmissible or unavailing. Per Stanard, J.

May &c. v. State bank of N. Carolina, 56

II. What judgment does not estop from alleging previous extinction.

2. In an action by a corporation, a special verdict was rendered, which found, that by the act creating the corporation, it was to continue until the 1st of January 1830, and that by a subsequent act the charter was extended until the first of January 1835. Other facts were found in relation to the merits of the claim, upon which the circuit court, on the 24th of October 1831, gave judgment for the defendants. An assignment of the claim was made by the corporation on the 6th of December 1831. Whereupon, to wit in June 1832, a supersedeas was obtained to the judgment, upon a petition in the name of the corporation. In April 1837, the court of appeals reversed the judgment, and entered judgment for the plaintiffs; and in May 1837, judgment was entered in the circuit court in pursuance thereof. Execution being then issued, one of the defendants gave a forthcoming bond with surety, which was forfeited. Upon this bond a motion was made for award of execution in the name of the corporation, and the defendants produced the acts before mentioned, to shew 858 that the charter expired on the 1st of January 1835; and this prima facie evidence of the extinction of the corporation was not met by any countervailing proof on the other side; but it was insisted that the judgment of the appellate court imported that the corporation was in existence at that time, and estopped the defendants from shewing the contrary: held, that according to The Bank of Alexandria v. Patton and others, 1 Rob. 499, had the attempt been made, when this case was in the appellate court, to arrest further proceedings therein on the ground that the charter had expired, it would have been fruitless; and as the judgment of the appellate court could not have been prevented by shewing that the charter had expired, so there cannot be a legal intendment of the existence of the corporation, from the fact of the judgment being rendered. The forthcoming bond and the execution under which it was taken were therefore quashed, and the assignee left to proceed in equity to obtain the benefit of the judgment: dissentiente Baldwin, J.

DOWER.

I. When precluded by sale under vendor's lien.

1. The vendor of land conveys the same to the vendee in fee simple, and receives part of the purchase money, but no security for the residue. On a bill in equity against the vendee to enforce the implied equitable lien of the vendor, a decree is made for the sale of the land, and the proceeds are more than sufficient to satisfy what remains due to the vendor. The surplus is claimed by creditors of the vendee who have obtained judgments against him, and taken him in execution, from which he escaped. With the vendee's assent, a decree is made in favour of those creditors for the surplus. Afterwards, the vendee dying, a bill is filed by his widow against those in possession of the land, to wit, one to whom the purchaser at the sale under the decree had aliened the whole, and two others to whom that one had aliened a part, claiming to be endowed: held by two judges (Stanard and Baldwin) that the land *in the hands of the purchasers is not chargeable to the widow, and that her bill must be dismissed; dissentiente Allen, J., whose opinion was, that the widow was entitled to dower in the surplus which remained after satisfying the vendor's lien, and that the amount to which she was entitled constituted a charge upon the land in the hands of the purchaser at the sale under the decree, and of those claiming under him.

III. Right to dower in woodland.

3. A husband dies seized of land incapable of cultivation, and no otherwise productive or valuable than by working the timber and making sale thereof when converted into shingles. It appears that previous to as well as after the husband's death, the timber was worked, and large profits derived from the sale of shingles. Parties coming into possession after the husband's death, under a deed of trust made by him in his lifetime, admit his widow's right as dowress to one third of the timber worked, and for several years pay her one third of the proceeds of the same. Payment is afterwards stopped: held, those in possession of the land after the husband's death shall account to the widow or her administrator for one third of the profits received by them during her life, subject to credit for the payments made by them to the widow.

Macaulay's ex'or v. Dismal swamp land co., 507

IV. Right to recover profits from husband's death.

4. Where a husband makes a deed of trust conveying land with power to the trustees to sell the same for payment of debts, and they allow the husband to remain in possession during his life, and make no sale under the deed until after his death, the husband is to be considered as having died seized of the land subject to the deed of trust, so that his widow, if she did not join in the deed, and is entitled to dower in the land, may recover rents and profits from the husband's death in like manner as if the deed had not been made. In case the widow die before recovering such rents and profits, the same may be recovered to the period of her death by her administrator.

V. Mode of enjoying dower in proceeds of land sold.

5. The principle laid down in Herbert and others v. Wren and others, 7 Cranch 380, that where land in which there is a right of dower is sold in a suit to which the tenant in dower is a party, the other parties interested "have a right to insist that instead of a sum in gross, one third of the purchase money shall be set apart, and the interest thereof paid annually to the tenant in dower during her life," approved.

Wilson &c. v. Davisson, 384

VI. Mode of calculating present value of dower interest.

6. The table of longevity referred to, which was made by professor Wigglesworth of Cambridge university, and published in the Transactions of the American academy, vol. 2, p. 133, and also republished in the American Jurist, vol. 11, p. 492, and in 2 Rob. Pract. p. 381. When the present value of a dower interest is to be calculated, the probable duration of the life by which it is limited and the sum derived from it annually, are first to be ascertained, and then the calculation is to be made, not by discounting simple interest, but by discounting compound interest. For the present value of an annuity is that sum which, being improved at compound interest, will be sufficient to pay the annuity.

VII. What laches will preclude right to account.

7. Under a deed of trust of land made by a husband, the trustees after his death sell the land, and the purchaser conveys it away to others. A bill is afterwards filed by the widow against the trustees, the purchaser's executor, and those in possession, claiming dower in the land, and an account of profits; pending which suit the widow dies.

861 The bill *upon its face shews a delay, without excuse, of more than 20 years in calling the trustees and the purchaser's executor to an account. The surviving trustee swears positively that he has paid over to the widow every dollar for which he and his cotrustee were accountable, and exhibits vouchers in proof of his allegation. The widow, by her own shewing in the bill, prosecuted to recovery a suit against the executor of the purchaser, for her share of the profits received by him; and the only pretext for a further demand, and that without a shadow of proof, is that she did not recover enough: held, the plaintiff is entitled to no account as regards the trustees and the purchaser's executor, and the bill was properly dismissed as to them.

EJECTMENT.

What ejectment on demise of insolvent debtor cannot be sustained. See Insolvent No. 3, and Syrus &c. v. Allison, 200

ELEGIT.

Lien of elegit on land conveyed in trust, and rights of elegit creditor against purchaser under the deed.

1. Under a deed of trust conveying land with general warranty to secure debts, the land is sold for more than enough to pay those debts. The purchaser institutes a proceeding against the grantor for unlawful detainer, and obtains a judgment against him. And then the purchaser insists, 1. that he was not bound to pay his purchase money (and therefore cannot be charged with interest on the same) until he obtained possession; and 2. that he may retain part of the surplus of the purchase money to pay the costs recovered by the judgment on his complaint for unlawful detainer. The claims of the purchaser are objected to by a creditor of the grantor, who obtained a decree against him after the deed of trust, and sued out an elegit within the year: held (per totam curiam) the claims so made by the purchaser cannot be allowed.—The purchaser further claims to apply other parts of the surplus to extinguish a dower right in the property existing at the time of the warranty, and to pay taxes assessed on the property before the sale was made: held by two judges (dissentiente Stanard, J.) these claims also must be disallowed.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

I. Commissions and other charges.

1. As a general rule, an executor is not entitled to commission on the amount of debt due from him to the testator, and credited to the estate in the executorial account. Accord. Carter's ex'ors v. Cutting and wife, 5 Munf. 227.

Farneyhough's ex'ors v. Dickerson &c., 582

2. The commission of an executor should not be on the amount of his disbursements. He ought generally to be allowed a commission on the amount of the credits in his account, except on a credit for a debt due from him to the testator. Though some of the credits are for bonds due the estate, that were passed over by the executor to legatees, and voluntarily received by the latter, commissions will nevertheless be allowed the executor on the amount of such bonds.

S. C., 582

3. An item of $21, paid by executors for services rendered by a clerk, being allowed by commissioners, the same was excepted to by legatees, upon the ground that what the clerk did ought to have been done by the executors, and therefore that he should be paid out of their commissions. The record contained no evidence on the subject, except that the date of the item was a few days after the date of a large credit for sales at public auction, which furnished some ground for the inference that the clerk was employed during those sales: held, the court of probate did not err in overruling the exception.

FERRY.

I. Effect of inquisition on application to establish ferry.

1. Construction of the act in 2 R. C. 1819, p. 261, ch. 238, which provides for the impaneling of a jury to say whether, in their opinion, public convenience will result from the establishment of a proposed ferry, and for the return of this opinion to the county court, "who thereupon, as well as upon any other evidence that may be offered, shall have full power to establish such ferry." The finding of the jury in which a case is merely evidence, and the weight of it, under all the circumstances, a matter for the discretion of the court.

Muire &c. v. Smith, 458

II. What is no ground for quashing such inquisition.

2. Upon the return of the certificate of a jury, that, in their opinion, public convenience would result from the establishment of a proposed ferry, evidence is introduced, 1. Of one of the jurors, who proved, that before he was sworn, he had made up an opinion that the ferry would be a public convenience; that he thought it probable he might have expressed this opinion, though he did not recollect to have done so; that he had, before he was sworn, signed a petition for the said ferry; and that, at the time he was sworn, he was uninfluenced by the said opinion, and prepared to render an impartial verdict. 2. Of another juror, who proved the like facts with regard to himself, and also that he had expressed his opinion. 3. Of another juror, who proved the same facts with regard to himself that the second had proved with regard to himself, and also that he had circulated a petition for the ferry. Upon this evidence the county court quashed the finding of the jury, and the circuit court reversed the judgment of the county court: held, the judgment of the circuit court is right.

III. Declaration in case for disturbance of franchise.

3. A declaration in case by the owner of a ferry for the disturbance of his franchise, contains two counts, each of which is demurred to. The first count sets forth, in substance, that the plaintiff was possessed of a legally established ferry; that there were good and convenient roads, ways and landings for the use of the same; and that there was, and of right ought to have been, a free and uninterrupted passage for the water flowing in and down the river, so as not to affect or injure the landings, ways or roads at the ferry: and it charges that the defendants wrongfully placed obstructions in the river near the ferry and landings, by which the current of the stream was checked and diverted, and thrown from and upon the landings (in modes particularly described); thereby occasioning the plaintiff great labour and expense, destroying or injuring the roads and landings, rendering the embarkation and debarkation difficult, and preventing the transportation of persons and property. The second count is the same, except that, instead of alleging a possession of the ferry by the plaintiff, *it avers his right to the reversion thereof, expectant upon the term of his tenant, in whom the possession, use and enjoyment are charged to be, and that the grievance complained of is to the prejudice of the plaintiff's reversionary estate: held, both counts are good on general demurrer: dissentiente Allen, J., who was of opinion as to the second count, that it not being for the accruing damages consequent upon the obstruction, but by the reversioner for an injury to the inheritance, it could not be sustained without an averment in it of possession of the landings, or of some right to their use.

Patrick v. Ruffners, 209

IV. What proof will maintain such action.

4. In an action by the grantee of a ferry against a wrongdoer who disturbs the enjoyment of his franchise, the grant of the franchise from the public, the use of the ferry with its appurtenant landings and outlets, and the fact of such disturbance, are all that need be established. Nor is it material whether the disturbance is by invading the plaintiff's right to the exclusive transportation and tolls, or by obstructing or impairing his navigation, or by destroying or injuring the landings and outlets. Per Baldwin, J.

Patrick v. Ruffners, 209

FIERI FACIAS.

I. Effect of return as evidence in action against sheriff.

1. In debt on a sheriff's official bond, two breaches are assigned: 1. that the sheriff had levied an execution of the relator against an administrator, on slaves of the decedent, but negligently suffered them to be eloiigned and carried off: 2. that the sheriff might have levied the execution on such slaves, but neglected so to do. At the trial, the plaintiff, to shew the issuing of the execution, and the reception and disposition thereof by the sheriff, was under the necessity of giving in evidence not only the execution with the return originally made thereon, but also an amendment of that return, made by leave of court. This amendment had been made not by obliterating the first return and substituting another in its place, but in a more proper manner by making an addition to the first return; and the return thus constituted of that originally made, and of what was afterwards added, was upon its face contradictory in itself: held, that the defendant had a right to rely upon said return as prima facie evidence in his favour; that the plaintiff, on the other hand, was at liberty to disprove any part of it, as well by intrinsic evidence furnished by the return itself, as by evidence aliunde; that it was competent for the defendant in like manner to sustain any part of the return; and it was the province of the jury to decide, upon the whole evidence furnished by the return or otherwise, whether or not the execution was levied by the sheriff upon the property of the intestate in the hands of the administrator, and the same thereafter eloiigned and lost by the negligence of the sheriff; or whether or not the sheriff might have levied upon such property in the hands of the administrator, but neglected so to do.

Lathrop v. Lumpkin &c., 49

II. Effect of sale under second of two fi. fas.

2. Whilst on the one hand, where an officer holding two executions sells under the second, the title of the purchaser is good against the plaintiff in the first, and the remedy of the latter is against the officer, so on the other hand the purchaser at such sale cannot invoke the lien of the first execution, in aid of a title acquired at a sale made under the second. Therefore, where a slave was levied upon under a fi. fa. delivered to a constable before any conveyance of the slave by the debtor, and other executions issued after such conveyance, under which (and not under the first fi. fa.) the evidence tended to prove that the slave was sold, it was held, in an action brought by the grantee in the conveyance against the purchaser at the sale, that the title of the purchaser must be referred to the process under which the sale was made. Accord. Eckhols v. Graham & others, 1 Call 492.

M'Key &c. v. Garth, 33

III. Action against sheriff purchasing at his own sale under fi. fa.

3. The owner of a slave sells her, but remains in possession. The slave is afterwards levied upon under execution, 866 *and the vendee forbidding the sheriff to sell, the creditor gives an indemnifying bond with security, and then the slave is sold by the sheriff, and the sheriff becomes himself the purchaser, though at the time in the name of another. In an action of detinue by the first vendee against the sheriff so purchasing, held, the question whether a sheriff can acquire title by a purchase at his own sale does not arise, but the proper enquiry is whether the title of the plaintiff is valid against the execution creditor.

Tavener v. Robinson, 280

IV. Injunction to sale of slave under execution.

4. Injunction by distributee's donee of a slave to sale under execution for distributee's debt to the estate. See Legatees &c. No. 8, and FORCIBLE ENTRY.

Case in which, on a complaint by a party under the statute in 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 115, p. 455, that another had forcibly turned him out of possession of a tenement, the jury returned a special verdict finding the facts, and upon those facts the court considered that the entry was not "with strong hand or with multitude of people," and rendered judgment that the complaint be dismissed.

Pauley v. Chapman, 235

FOREIGN ATTACHMENT.

When assignee's plea that the debtor was resident is demurrable.

In a suit in equity in the circuit court of Russell, against an absent debtor having lands within the commonwealth, after a valuation of the lands had been made and returned, two persons filed petitions, setting forth that they had purchased the lands from the debtor and received conveyances of the same, and praying to be made defendants. The court ordered the plaintiff to amend his bill and make them parties, which was accordingly done. Whereupon they filed a plea alleging, that at the time the subpoena was sued out, the debtor was a resident of the county of Russell and state of Virginia, subject to the process of the common law courts of said county, and possessed of personalty sufficient to discharge the debts due by him to the plaintiff. To this plea the plaintiff demurred: held, the demurrers should be sustained: for the petition is only a part of the case for the purpose of having the petitioners made defendants; and so far as the record discloses, they may have been mere strangers, having no right to intermeddle. Whether the debtor was nonresident or not, was a question foreign to them, until by their answers they had shewn they had an interest in the controversy.

Smith v. Hunt &c., 206

FORGERY.

I. Of what writing forgery cannot be committed.

1. Indictment for forging, with intent to defraud W. & W., a letter in the following terms: "Nottaway, April 24, 1841. Gent., Agreeable to mr. Wm. I. Watkins' request, I take pleasure in making you acquainted with his name, and would say to you that he is very extensively engaged in the manufacturing of tobacco, and has made some large purchases, and says that he wishes to patronize you (on my recommendation). You may be assured that whatever he engages to do he will certainly perform. He says it is probable he will want 1000 dollars by the 1st of May, to meet his engagements, and if he apply for the amount, I have no doubt but you will accommodate him. The roads are in such a condition that it is impossible to get any produce to market. Write me a few lines by mr. Watkins, and say what the chance is for a rise in tobacco. Your compliance with the above will very much oblige your ob't servant, Joseph M. Foulkes.—P. S. Mr. Watkins prefers giving a negotiable note payable in Petersburg Exchange bank, where he can always have an opportunity to send at the shortest notice and draw. He is not a gentleman of a low mean degree, but one that is a perfect gentleman in every sense of the term. I am confident, as I have observed to him, that you will either *let him have the money. or endorse for him. J. M. F.": held, this is not a writing in respect whereof forgery can be committed, either at common law or under the statute.

Foulkes v. Commonwealth, 837

II. Party whose signature is forged need not be called.

2. Upon a trial for forgery of a written instrument, the commonwealth may, without producing as a witness the party by whom the instrument purports to be signed, and without accounting for his absence, prove by the evidence of other witnesses that the instrument is not genuine; such evidence not being in its nature secondary to that of the party whose signature is in question.

III. Secondary proof of forged instrument

3. On trial of indictment for forgery of a letter of credit with intent to defraud W. & W., the commonwealth proves that a draft, presented by the prisoner to W. & W. at the same time with the letter of credit, had been filed, together with an indictment against the prisoner for forging the same, with the clerk of the court, who, on making search for the draft among the papers in his office, has been unable to find it; and thereupon the commonwealth offers secondary evidence of the contents of the draft; no notice having been given to the prisoner, before the jury was impaneled, of any intention to offer such evidence: held, the foundation so laid for the admission of the secondary evidence is sufficient.

FORMER RECOVERY.

What defence of a former recovery for the same cause of action is not sustained.

In assumpsit for work and labour done, care and diligence bestowed, and materials provided, the defendant, besides the general issue, pleaded a former action for not performing the same promises, in which the plaintiff recovered damages for the nonperformance of the same: the plaintiff replied that the promises were not the same identical promises in respect whereof the judgment was recovered, and tendered an issue, which was joined. At the trial, the plaintiff having given evidence on the general issue, the defendant, to sustain his plea of former recovery, gave in evidence the record of the former suit, the declaration in which contained two counts, one for work and labour, care and diligence, and materials, as well as for goods sold, money lent, money paid, and money received; and the other upon an account stated. The defendant also gave in evidence the account filed in that case, which contained credits and charges up to the 24th of October 1835, "leaving out the building of a large barn, and work done on a new mill." The verdict and judgment in that case being for $630.53 cents, the plaintiff examined a witness, who proved that an account was settled with the defendant in October 1835, on which a balance of $630.53 cents was struck; that the account filed in the former cause was a copy of the account so settled; and that the settlement did not include the plaintiff's demand for work done on the barn or the new mill, charged in the account in the second case, but that this demand remained for future adjustment. It was farther proved, that on the trial in the former cause, the account not being then filed which was afterwards filed in the second suit, all evidence in regard to that account was excluded, and the plaintiff rested his case on the count upon an account stated, and relied upon the settlement before mentioned, shewing the said balance of $630.53 cents, and recovered upon that ground only. Thereupon the defendant moved the court to exclude from the jury all the evidence offered by the plaintiff in support of the items charged in the account filed in the second case, on the ground that he was precluded from recovering the same in this action by the recovery in the former suit, and that the demand of the plaintiff for the said sum of $630.53 cents recovered in the former suit, and for the items charged in the account filed in this case, was one entire demand, and could not be made the subject of two separate suits, and therefore the plaintiff was precluded by the recovery in the former suit from recovering in this suit. But the court 868 *overruled the motion, and a verdict was rendered for the sum found by the jury to be due upon the account filed in the second case. On a supersedeas to the judgment given on this verdict, the same was affirmed.

Buckles v. Lafferty's legatees, 292

2. The vendor of a slave continuing in possession until an execution was levied on the slave more than a year after the sale, and the presumption arising from the inconsistency of the possession with the title claimed by the vendee not being repelled by any circumstances appearing in the case, but the circumstances on the contrary confirming the presumption of fraud, the sale declared void as to the execution creditor.

Tavener v. Robinson, 280

FREEHOLD.

A lot of land being sold for a sum of money payable by instalments, the vendee receives immediate possession, and the vendor signs, seals, and acknowledges before magistrates, a conveyance of the land to the vendee in fee simple, which is thereupon, by consent of the parties, placed in the keeping of a third person, to be retained by him until the whole purchase money is paid, and to be then delivered to the vendee. The vendee pays some of the instalments as they become due; others are still unpaid, the time of payment not having arrived: held, this vendee is a freeholder duly qualified to serve as a grand juror.

GAMING.

I. What is no evidence against assignee of bond.

1. Answer of assignor of bond is no evidence against assignee codefendant to prove gaming consideration. See Codefendants No. 1, and

Pettit v. Jennings &c., 676

II. Liability of obligor in gaming bond to assignee.

2. Though, upon a bill in equity by an obligor against the obligee and his assignee, it be fully proved that the bond was given for a gaming consideration, still the obligor will not be discharged from liability to the assignee, if the assignee had no knowledge before the bond was assigned of its having been executed for money won at play, and was induced to purchase the same by the assurances of the obligor that there was no objection to it and that it would be paid. Per Baldwin, J. Accord. Buckner &c. v. Smith &c., 1 Wash. 296; Hoomes v. Smock, 1 Wash. 389; Davis's adm'r v. Thomas &c., 5 Leigh 1. Under such circumstances, the only question is as to the amount of the obligor's liability to the assignee. Is it the whole amount of the bond, or is it the sum paid by the assignee to the assignor for the assignment? Per Baldwin, J., it is the former; per Allen, J., the latter.

III. Decree over for obligor in gaming bond against obligee.

3. In an injunction suit by the obligor in a gaming security against the obligee and assignee, if the gaming consideration be admitted by the obligee's answer, but not proved by any competent evidence against the assignee, the injunction will be dissolved and the bill dismissed as to the assignee, but not as to the obligee. *As to him the cause will be retained until payment by the obligor to the assignee of the money due the latter, in order that a decree may then be rendered therefor in favour of the obligor against the obligee.

Pettit v. Jennings &c., 676

IV. Prosecution for unlawful gaming.

4. The statute of March 26, 1842, (Acts of 1841-2, ch. 69, § 4, p. 44,) enacting "that in all recoveries hereafter had for violations of the gaming laws, the fee recovered shall be ten dollars for the commonwealth's attorney, and the sum of thirty dollars shall be paid to the literary fund in lieu of the sum as at present provided," had no application whatever to offences committed before its passage, but such offences remained liable to prosecution and punishment under the preexisting law, in the same manner as if the said statute has never been passed.

V. Process on indictment for playing.

5. A party being indicted for playing at an unlawful game, the court immediately awards a capias against him, returnable the next day; at the return day, he moves to quash the capias as improper process, which motion the court overrules, and compels him to plead forthwith: held, the irregularity (if any) in this proceeding is no sufficient ground to reverse judgment against the defendant.

GUARDIAN AND WARD.

I. Action against guardian for necessities.

1. In an action brought by keepers of a boarding school against a guardian, for board, tuition, and other necessities furnished to the ward, the administrator of a previous guardian is a competent witness for the plaintiffs. But if it appear that the board, tuition, and other necessities were furnished at the request of the previous guardian, and no express promise has been made by the second guardian to pay therefor, the action against the second guardian for the same cannot be maintained.

Young v. Warne &c., 420

II. Liability of ex'or guardian de facto.

2. For several years an infant legatee resides with and is maintained by her grandmother, who is chargeable with the payment of the legacy, the annual interest of which is less than the annual value of the maintenance: held, the grandmother shall not be charged with interest on the legacy during the period of such maintenance.

Arrington v. Cheatham & wife, 492

III. Decree in suit by ward distributee against guardian adm'r.

3. The administrator of an intestate is also guardian of one of the distributees. Upon the termination of the guardianship, a bill is filed against the guardian and his sureties, to recover what is due upon the guardianship account. An amended bill is afterwards filed against the administrator and his sureties, to recover what is due on the administration account. Reports are made of both accounts. But, for reasons appearing to the court, the guardianship account is recommitted; and then, by consent of parties, the administration account is also recommitted. A further report is made upon the guardianship account, and none upon the administration account. Whereupon the cause is heard as to the guardian and his sureties, upon the further report so made, and a decree is entered against them for the sum deemed by the court to be due upon the guardianship account. From this decree an appeal is taken by a party interested to get rid of or reduce the amount. In the appellate court it is urged by the appellee, that the balance stated as due on the guardian's account should be augmented, by incorporating in it the appellee's share of the balance due on the administration account: held, this claim cannot be sustained: 1st, because the case was heard and the decree rendered between the parties *to, and on the claim made by, the original bill for the settlement of the guardianship account, as contradistinguished from the administration account, the settlement of which was sought by the amended bill: 2dly, because the case was not prepared for hearing as to the administration account; it standing, as to that account, on a consent order recommitting the same, and the record of course furnishing no account on which a definite charge or decree in respect to the administration account could be made: 3dly, because no claim was made in the court below by the appellee, to bring into the guardianship account any charge against the guardian arising out of the administration account.

HEARING OF CAUSE.

I. What setting for hearing is premature.

1. In a suit in chancery, when an answer is filed at rules in due time, four months from the time of the replication to the answer are allowed the parties for taking their depositions, by the act of February 17, 1823, in Sess. Acts of 1822-3, p. 39, ch. 37, § 1, Suppl. to Rev. Code, p. 129. And until the expiration of the said four months, neither party has the right (without the consent of the other) to set the cause for hearing.

Poling v. Johnson, 255

II. Consequence if cause be prematurely set and heard.

2. It appearing by the record of a suit in chancery, that the answer and replication were filed at August rules 1840; that at September rules 1840 the plaintiff set the cause for hearing; and that on the 5th of October 1840 the cause was heard upon the bill, answer, replication, depositions, exhibits, and arguments of counsel, and a decree made against the defendants, held, the cause was prematurely set for hearing, and prematurely heard. The decree was therefore reversed with costs, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to send the case to rules, there to remain for two months before it shall be set for hearing at the instance of either party, (unless it be set for hearing before the lapse of the two months by the consent of parties,) and for such decree in the case after it shall be set for hearing, as may be proper. I. When husband is a mere trustee for the wife.

1. By deed of marriage settlement, personal property of the wife is conveyed to the husband for the exclusive *benefit of the wife and her children during her life, and at her death for her issue, if any then living; and it is provided that in the event of the wife's dying without issue, the property shall be distributed in the same manner as if the deed had not been made. Upon the death of the husband without children (the wife still living), a creditor of the husband, at whose suit the latter took the oath of insolvency, claims that the husband has an interest in the property, which may be charged in the event of the wife's dying without issue: held, the conveyance to the husband was merely in the character of trustee, and its effect was to intercept the marital rights of the husband, and preclude him from all beneficial interest during the existence of the trust; that the provision for the event of the wife's dying without issue looked not to the state of things existing at the time of the marriage, but to such as should exist at the death of the wife; that the purpose was in such event to divest the legal title conveyed to the husband as trustee, and let the personal estate stand upon the same footing as any other personal chattels of a wife not reduced into possession by the husband during the coverture; that if the husband had survived the wife, he would have had a right to administer upon her personal estate, and hold the same free from distribution; but in the event that actually occurred, of the survivorship of the wife, the husband at no time acquired any individual ownership of the subject.

III. Validity, as against wife surviving, of husband's assignment of her personalty.

3. The rule laid down by sir Thomas Plumer in Hornsby v. Lee, 2 Madd. C. R. 16, american edi. 352, and Purdew v. Jackson, 1 Russ. 1, and afterwards confirmed by lord Lyndhurst in Honner v. Morton, 3 Russ. 65, 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 298, that where a husband assigns personal property in which his wife has a reversionary interest expectant on the death of tenant for life, and the wife and the tenant for life both outlive the husband, the wife is entitled by survivorship in preference to the assignee, recognized as correct by Allen, J. Contra, opinion of Gibson, C. J., in the case of Siter & another, 4 Rawle 471-483.

Browning v. Headley, 340

4. The rule laid down in Lord Carteret v. Paschal, 3 P. Wms. 197, 2 Brown's Par. Cas. 10 (Tomlin's edi.) and Bates v. Dandy, 2 Atk. 207, 1 Russ. 33, note, and 3 Russ. 70, 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 301, note, that where the wife has a present interest in personal property, and the husband makes a particular assignment of that interest for valuable consideration, though the thing assigned be no farther reduced into possession during the coverture, the title of the particular assignee will be good against the wife surviving, recognized as correct by judges Allen and Stanard. S. C., 340, 41

5. A testator directed his personal estate to be divided into shares, of which he gave one share to his daughter. The daughter's husband, for valuable consideration, assigned all the interest to which he was entitled, in right of his wife, in her father's estate. After this assignment, an act of assembly was passed by the legislature of Kentucky, in which state the husband and wife had become domiciled, declaring the marriage contract between them forever dissolved so far as respects her, and restoring her to all the rights and privileges of an unmarried woman, and further declaring her entitled, out of the estate of the husband, to receive alimony agreeably to the laws of the commonwealth. On a bill by the assignee against the testator's executor, the husband, and the wife, to recover her share of her father's estate, held by two judges, 1. That by the act of divorce, the right of the wife to her choses in action not reduced into possession during the coverture, is placed on the same ground as if the husband had then died: but, 2. That the interest of the wife in the subject assigned being 872 a present, not a reversionary *interest, and there being a particular assignment of that interest for valuable consideration, the title of the assignee is good against the wife. S. C., 341

IV. Wife's right to provision against husband and his assignee.

6. The doctrine of the english chancery, that where an absolute equitable interest is given to the wife, the court will not permit the husband to recover it without making a provision for the wife, and that the husband's assignee, whether general or particular, takes his interest subject to the same equity, recognized as binding upon the courts of this state. And the doctrine carried farther than it was carried in Beresford &c. v. Hobson &c., 1 Madd. C. R. 361, american edi. 199, by sir Thomas Plumer, who considered that the court in no case had given the whole to the wife; not even "where the husband has left his wife and gone abroad."

Browning v. Headley, 341

7. A testator directs his estate other than slaves to be turned into money, and directs the slaves and money to be divided amongst ten legatees, any advances to whom are to be deducted from their respective shares. The husband of a daughter assigns her interest for valuable consideration. On a bill by the assignee against the executor, the husband, and the wife, it is insisted by the wife that a provision should be made for her. No evidence is taken by the assignee to shew that the whole interest would be more than an adequate provision. But it appears that the penalty of the executor's bond was only 30,000 dollars, and the consideration for the assignment only 1500 dollars; that the husband had received from the testator upwards of 2000 dollars in money and property, and that he had squandered the same, and then abandoned his wife, leaving her with 6 or 7 children in a destitute condition, in consequence of which she obtained a divorce: held, under the circumstances, no enquiry before a commissioner is necessary, to ascertain what would be a reasonable provision for the wife; that it is plain the whole residue coming from her father's estate will not be more than an adequate provision for her; and the bill should be dismissed. The circuit court, being of opinion that the conveyance by metes and bounds by one joint tenant, of a portion of the land held jointly, was void, refused to permit the same to go in evidence to the jury; and a verdict and judgment were rendered for the demandants: held, the circuit court erred; and its judgment therefore reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial, on which the conveyance, if offered, is not to be rejected on the ground that it is void.

JUDGMENT.

- I. What is the record of a judgment confessed, and how far evidence aliunde is admissible to shew the power and action of attorney confessing the same.

1. On a motion for award of execution against three obligors in a forthcoming bond, one of whom is principal and the other two are sureties, the entry upon the record states that as well the plaintiffs came by their attorney, "as the defendant M." (the principal) "in his proper person, and the other defendants by their attorney, and the said defendants acknowledge judgment." In the same entry (after the judgment) is the following: "And the plaintiffs by their attorney here in court release to the defendants 183 dollars 60 cents, and agree to stay execution of this judgment until the first day of the next term." On a bill in equity by the sureties, claiming a discharge on the ground that the agreement to stay was without their consent *or knowledge, it is alleged that the sureties did not appear by an attorney at law, but by an attorney in fact; that the power under which the attorney acted did not authorize him to confess judgment with stay of execution; and that in fact he never consented to such stay, but the agreement for the stay was with the principal alone. The power of attorney is in these words: "We authorize J. M. to confess judgment for us and in our name, on a delivery bond in favour of S. & S. executed by us on the 18th November 1840;" and is signed and sealed by the three obligors; held, 1. That the entry must be taken altogether, and regarded as the record of a judgment between the parties upon the confession of the defendants therein, with the condition of a stay of execution. 2. That it not appearing from that record whether the sureties appeared by an attorney at law or an attorney in fact, evidence aliunde is admissible for the purpose of proving that they appeared by an attorney in fact, and to shew the authority under which he acted. 3. That the power of attorney under which the attorney acted did authorize the confession of a judgment with stay of execution. 4. That parol testimony is not admissible to prove that so much of the entry as relates to the stay of execution was without the consent of the said attorney; dissentiente Standard, J.

3. On the separate trial of a prisoner jointly indicted with three others for murder, several persons called as jurors are examined on voir dire touching their indifference. 1. One of them states, that he has heard rumours and conversations in the country touching the case of the prisoner, and a representation of part of the evidence given on the trial of one of the parties indicted with him, and from these sources of information, if the same be true, he had made up an opinion of decided character, which he still entertains, and which will remain the same unless removed by evidence of a state of facts different from what he has heard; but he feels no prejudice or bias for or against the prisoner, and is satisfied that the opinion so formed and entertained would have no influence upon his mind in trying him, and that he could now give him as impartial a trial upon the evidence as if he had heard nothing of his case. 2. Another juror states, that he has heard no evidence in relation to the prisoner's case, nor formed any opinion on the question of his guilt or innocence; that he was present at the trial of another of the parties indicted, and heard a part of the evidence, from which he had formed a decided opinion as to that party, and if he were now called to try him, he should be influenced thereby; but that opinion would have no influence 875 *upon his mind in trying this prisoner, as to whom he feels no prejudice or prepossession, and he thinks he could try him as fairly and impartially as if he had heard nothing about the transaction. 3. A third juror states, that he heard the reports in the country concerning the death of the deceased, and the prisoners implicated therein, and had formed some opinion thereon, dependent upon the truth and fulness of those reports; he believed them to be true at the time he heard them, and the opinion formed on them was decided, and yet rests upon his mind; but he is satisfied the opinion so formed would have no influence upon him in trying the prisoner, and he could now try him according to the evidence, free from any leaning or bias for or against him, and decide the case as impartially as if he had previously heard nothing of it: held, all of these persons are good and impartial jurors.

3. An obligation given on the retainer of counsel to defend the obligor on a charge of forgery, is assigned by the counsel, and judgment is obtained thereupon by the assignees, on which judgment execution issues, under which a forthcoming bond is taken, and judgment is rendered thereupon. After these proceedings, without any defence having been made at law, and without any excuse for not making it, an injunction is obtained on the ground that the obligor was induced to employ the obligee, by the menace that if he did not, the obligee would act as counsel against him in aid of the prosecution: held, the injunction should be dissolved and the bill dismissed: for if in law such a contract was valid, a court of equity has no right to absolve the party from it; and if in law the contract was invalid, the defence should have been made in that forum.

VI. What grants of adm'n are valid: what payments by representative of deceased adm'r to succeeding adm'r are good against legatees: for what assets succeeding adm'r and his sureties are liable to legatees.

6. Pending a suit in chancery by legatees against an executor to recover their legacies, the executor died. Process was awarded to revive the suit against his administrator; and the administrator dying, process was issued and an order entered to revive the suit against his representative. But afterwards that process was quashed and that order set aside, as early as 1811; and then, by consent of parties, the suit was revived against the administrator de bonis non of the executor, and by like consent it was entered that the cause was not to abate by the death of any of the parties. A personal decree was obtained in 1818 by the legatees against the administrator de bonis non, from which he appealed. Pending the appeal, he died. Whereupon, though the two former grants of administration on the executor's estate had been by the court of Orange, the court of Hanover now granted administration on the same estate, not in the form of a grant de bonis non, but of an original grant. At the instance of the legatees, a scire facias issued to revive the appeal against this new administrator, (calling him administrator de bonis non) which was duly executed, and in 1822 the decree affirmed. In the caption to the decree of affirmance, the name of the administrator de bonis non against whom the decree of the court below was entered did not appear as a party, but the new administrator was mentioned therein as appellant. In 1823, a bill of revivor and supplement was filed in the court below, convening before the court, and seeking to charge, the representatives of the first administrator and of the first administrator de bonis non. It turned out, that after the scire facias to revive the appeal had been executed, and before the decree of affirmance, the new administrator had, in the character of administrator de bonis non, brought suits and obtained decrees for the assets of the executor's estate in the hands of the representatives of the first administrator and of the first administrator de bonis non, against those representatives respectively, without opposition on their part; and the decrees so obtained were soon after satisfied. Those decrees were in 1820 and 1821, about six years before the decision in Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo &c., 5 Rand. 51: held, 1 (in accordance with Fisher v. Bassett and others, 9 Leigh 119,) that the grants of administration by the court of Orange to the first administrator and the first administrator de bonis non, never having been reversed or

877 *revoked, must be considered valid grants, which conferred upon those administrators respectively all the powers of rightful administrators. 2. That when the grant to the first administrator de bonis non expired by his death, and there was no conflicting right in existence, it was competent for the court which might in the first instance have rightfully exercised jurisdiction, to act on the subject; and Hanover court having acted when there was no such conflicting right, and its grant not having been reversed or revoked, that grant is valid, and the sureties in the administration bond taken by Hanover court are liable thereupon. 3. That as the legatees, after the death of the first administrator, dismissed his representative from the suit, it was lawful for that representative to pay over to the administrator against whom the legatees were proceeding, the unapplied assets of the executor's estate; and such payment, made in good faith and under the sanction of a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, is a complete protection to such representative against the legatees, as to the money so paid. 4. That the decree in favour of the legatees against the administrator de bonis non was personal, only in respect to the assets in his hands, and (it being nowhere alleged that he had converted or wasted the same) such unapplied assets coming to the hands of his representative must in equity be regarded as unadministered assets of the executor's estate; and the representative of the administrator de bonis non having in good faith, and in pursuance of the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, paid over the said assets to the administrator against whom the legatees revived the appeal, such payment protects the estate of the administrator de bonis non from the claim of the legatees. 5. That for the assets so paid over by the representatives of the first administrator and of the administrator de bonis non, the administrator to whom such payment was made, and the sureties in his official bond, are liable. 6. That the dismissal of the bill as to the representatives of the first administrator and of the administrator de bonis non should be without costs.

VII. Setoff of distributee's share against his purchases.

7. The rule laid down in Pulliam v. Winston &c., 5 Leigh 324, that a distributee purchasing at an administrator's sale cannot injoin the collection of the bond for his purchases until his distributive share is ascertained and set off against the bond, approved as a general one; but an exception to it is recognized.

Hickerson's adm'r v. Helm, 628

VIII. Injunction by distributive's donee of a slave to sale under execution for distributee's debt to estate, and setoff of distributable share against the judgment.

8. In November 1815, at a sale by an executor on twelve months credit, a distributee was one of the purchasers. The person requested to be her surety manifesting some reluctance to become such, the executor assured him that there was no danger of his having any thing to pay, as the purchases by the distributee were not so much as her portion of the estate. Whereupon the bond was executed. The executor died in 1821, and there was immediate administration on his estate, and on that of the first testator; but no suit was brought on the bond till 1827. Judgment was then obtained on it: and in the same year some of the legatees brought a suit for a settlement of the executorship account. In 1832, the distributee acquired slaves by the death of her father, and made a voluntary conveyance of them. One of them was sold under execution upon the judgment, and purchased by the administrator de bonis non at the sheriff's sale. Two others being afterwards levied on, the donee filed a bill in 1833 against the judgment creditor, to restrain the sale. During all this time there was no settlement of the executorship account; and none took place until the administrator of the executor was coerced to settle, by attachments for his contempt in disobeying the orders of the court in the suit of the legatees: held, 1. On the donee's bill, an injunction may be awarded to restrain the sale of the two slaves levied on, until the amount of the distributee's claim is ascertained; and when ascertained, the same may be set off against the judgment. 2. The distributee is an indis-

878 pensable party to *the donee's suit.

3. As a suit is pending in which all the other distributees are parties, there is no necessity to make them parties in the donee's suit, but the proper course is to retain the injunction until, by the adjustment of the account in the other suit, the amount of the distributee's claim is finally liquidated, and then to apply that amount as a setoff against the judgment. It being ascertained that after allowing credit for the entire claim of the distributee, she was indebted, at the time of the sale of the slave first levied on, more than the amount for which he sold, the credit in respect to that slave cannot be enlarged to what is estimated as his value at the time of the sale, but must be limited to the amount made on the execution by the sale of him: dissentiente Baldwin, J., on the last point.

12. A testator owing no debts and having bequeathed legacies, his executor voluntarily made considerable payments to the legatees, under an impression that a bond for a large amount, executed by a debtor of the testator to the latter in his lifetime, was good and would be collected. The bond turned out to be unavailing, and the other assets were less than what was paid the legatees: held, though the executor may not have been culpably negligent in respect to the bond, and therefore not chargeable with its whole amount, yet he cannot recover back from the legatees any part of what he had paid them. Case in which a defendant was brought in by a messenger to answer interrogatories. Johns v. Davis's ex'or &c., 729

I. Ownership of applicant for leave to erect mill, and proprietorship of party receiving notice.

1. A person owning real estate died intestate, leaving a widow and children; and dower not being assigned to the widow, she continued in the mansion house and the plantation thereto belonging. Under the act in 2 R. C. of 1819, ch. 235, § 1, p. 225, notice was given to the widow as the proprietor of the land, by a person desiring to build a machine useful to the public, and to abut his dam against the said land, that application would be made for a writ of ad quod damnum: and the writ was accordingly awarded, and an inquisition returned. After which, one of the heirs, who resided on the plantation with his mother, being made a defendant on his motion, moved the court to dismiss the case, upon the ground that notice of the application ought to have been given to him as one of the proprietors; but his motion was overruled. He then offered to introduce evidence to prove that the applicant did not own the land on which he proposed to erect his machine: but it being proved that the applicant was in possession of the land, claiming title to it, and had built a house thereon, the court refused to permit the evidence so offered to be introduced: held, there is no error in these proceedings. For it was sufficient that the person making the application was in the actual possession and occupation of the land on which the machine was to be built; and that the person to whom the notice was given was the tenant in possession, and appeared as the visible owner.

Pitzer v. Williams, 241

II. When mill owner cannot be enjoined from rebuilding dam.

2. Two verdicts were rendered in favour of a party whose land was overflowed, against the owner of a mill, for keeping his dam too high. The dam was then swept away; and the plaintiff at law thereafter exhibited a bill of injunction against the mill owner, which alleged that he had not begun, within the time prescribed by law, to rebuild the dam, and also contained a suggestion in general terms, that irreparable mischief would result to the plaintiff from rebuilding the same. It did not appear that there was any order of court granting leave to build the mill and dam; it did appear, however, that the mill and dam had existed more than 50 years: held, that the verdicts for keeping the dam too high shew that the mill owner had at least a prescriptive right to keep the dam at some height; that these verdicts did not warrant an injunction to restrain him from rebuilding the dam, in the absence of any allegation in the bill that he was about to build it, or had threatened to build it, beyond the authorized height; and that if it was competent for a court of equity to interpose at all to enforce a forfeiture of the mill owner's right because of his failure to rebuild the dam within the time prescribed by law, it ought not to be done by way of injunction, without an allegation in the bill of some distinct and sufficient ground of irreparable mischief.

I. Registry.

1. What registry of deed of trust of personal estate is invalid. See Registry, and Cocke v. Haxall's ex'x, 470

880 *II. What grantor has no right of redemption.

2. A deed in made, whereby, after reciting that F. the grantor hath sold to H. the grantee, for the sum of 200 dollars, certain real and personal estate, it is witnessed that the grantor, in consideration of that sum, conveys the same to the grantee; and then the deed concludes as follows: "It is agreed and fairly understood by and between the said F. and H. that in case the said H. or his heirs or assigns shall not be able to make the aforesaid 200 dollars out of the estate herein before conveyed, that then the said F. shall refund the same to the said H. or his heirs or assigns, with lawful interest thereon from this date till paid, or such part of the said 200 dollars as the said H. shall not be able to realize as aforesaid." Under the authority of this deed, the grantee sells and conveys the estate, and his grantee again sells and conveys the same. After which, to wit, about ten years after the date of the first mentioned deed, the grantor in that deed files a bill in equity to redeem the estate conveyed, on paying whatever may be due of the 200 dollars, with interest: held, the bill cannot be sustained. Allen, J., dissented, considering the case within the principle of Chowning v. Cox and others, 1 Rand. 306, recognized more recently in Breckenridge v. Auld and others, 1 Rob. 148. The two other judges who sat in the case (Stanard and Baldwin) considered it not within the principle of those cases.

III. Whether mortgagee may sell under power given by the mortgage.

3. The case of Chowning v. Cox and others, 1 Rand. 306, is a departure from the doctrine, now well settled in England and recognized in New York, that a mortgagee may sell the property after forfeiture, under a power given for that purpose in the mortgage deed: per Baldwin, J.—The doctrine so settled in England and recognized in New York seems to have been wholly overlooked by counsel and court in the argument and decision of Chowning v. Cox. Though this consideration may not warrant the reversal of that decision, it is most cogent to limit its authority to the particular case then in judgment. Per Stanard, J.

Miller v. Trevilian & others, 1

6. Slaves conveyed by deed of trust to secure what may be due from the grantor as guardian, are afterwards attached by a creditor of the grantor, and under the attachment are sold, subject to the prior lien of the deed of trust. In a suit by the ward, a decree is made for the sum due upon the guardianship account, and the decree directs the trustees to retain the slaves until the amount of the decree is satisfied, and then to surrender them to the purchaser at the sale under the attachment. On an appeal by the purchaser, the objection is taken that the decree ought to have provided for the sale of the slaves, so that out of the proceeds the amount of the decree might be paid, and the surplus paid to the appellant: held, the appellant has no right to have the decree reversed for this cause, but the same should be affirmed, with the addition thereto of a decree for the sale of the slaves; and the appellant should be decreed to pay the costs.

VI. Lien of elegit on land conveyed in trust.

Findlay v. Toncray, 374

VII. Contribution, after death of grantor, between realty and personalty conveyed for payment of debts.

8. In 1810 a deed of trust was made, whereby it was witnessed, that for the purpose of securing to the grantor's creditors their debts, and to make provision for the support, education and future settlement of his children, he conveyed his whole estate in trust for the payment of 881 his *debts, and for that purpose the trustees were empowered to sell from time to time such parts of the premises as to them might seem fit, or authorized to dispose of the same, or any part thereof, in such manner as might by them be deemed most beneficial and advantageous to all the parties interested; and out of the rents and profits, they were to support the grantor and his wife, and their family, during the joint lives of the grantor and his wife, and the survivor of them during the life of the survivor; and then the estate was in trust for such children of the grantor as he might leave at his death. After making this deed, the grantor died the same year (1810), leaving a widow, and three children by her. In 1811, the acting trustee sold a portion of the real property, and the proceeds were applied towards the discharge of the debts. In 1814 one of the children died, whereby her interest in remainder in the whole estate passed to her mother and the two other children. In 1815 another child died, whereby his like interest (embracing that acquired through the child that had first died) passed to his mother and the surviving child. And in 1816 the widow died, whereby the interest in the remainder which she had so acquired, passed, as to the realty, to her surviving child, and as to the personalty, to her second husband, who survived her and became her administrator. At the period of the widow's death, part of the real and part of the personal estate conveyed was undisposed of by the trustee; and thereafter he disposed of part of each to satisfy debts: held, 1. the conversion in 1811, of part of the realty into personalty, being within the authority and discretion of the trustee, and made at a time when there was no conflict, but an identity of interest, amongst those entitled to the estate, cannot, by reason of circumstances thereafter arising, furnish any equity for a reimbursement of the realty out of the personalty, or for contribution in favour of the former against the latter. 2. That though, upon the widow's death, the succession to the real fell into a different channel from the personal property, yet as the authority and discretion of the trustee in regard to sales of the property, whether real or personal, continued as before, no equity could arise between the realty and personalty for reimbursement of one to the other, neither being primarily, but the whole estate indiscriminately, subjected to payment of the debts by the provisions of the trust deed; which, and not the principles governing the administration of decedents' estates, must give the rule upon the subject. But 3. that an equity of a different nature did, however, arise out of the provisions of the trust deed, so soon as the successions to the realty and the personalty so fell into different channels; and it was simply this, that the owners of the realty and personalty should contribute to the burthen of paying the debts remaining unsatisfied at the widow's death, in proportion to the value of their respective interests: and the exercise by the trustee of the authority and discretion vested in him, should not have the effect of disturbing the due apportionment of that burthen amongst those several interests.

MUTUAL ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

I. Who are members.

1. Every owner of a present freehold estate in property which has been insured in the Mutual Assurance society, becomes a member thereof, according to the true spirit of the law and the scheme of the institution.

Shirley v. Mutal Assurance society, 705

II. Lien upon dower interest.

2. Where a husband insures property in the Mutual Assurance society and dies seized, his widow takes her dower interest subject to the lien of the society; but she incurs no personal *responsibility until dower is assigned her, whereby she becomes a member, and then only for such quotas and premium as accrue while she remains owner of the dower estate, with interest and damages thereon.

S. C., 705

III. Personal responsibility of successive tenants of premises insured.

3. Two tenements, which had been insured in the Mutual Assurance society, descend, upon the owner's death to his heirs, and are assigned to his widow for her dower.

The widow and her second husband sell and convey her life estate. And the society has a claim for quotas accrued after the death of the first husband; some before the assignment of dower; others afterwards and before the sale of the life estate; and the rest since that sale. It has also a claim for an additional premium accrued during the purchaser's ownership: held, 1. The heirs of the first husband are personally responsible for what accrued after his death and before the assignment of dower. 2. The widow and her second husband are personally liable for what accrued after the assignment of dower and before their sale. 3. The purchaser is personally responsible for what has accrued since, and for no more. 4. The party liable for any principal money is liable for interest and damages thereon.

IV. For what the lien exists, and how it will be enforced.

4. The Mutual Assurance society has a lien upon property insured therein for the principal and interest due the society, but not for damages. This lien is effectual not only against the original member, but against all persons deriving ownership from him, and the property may be sold to satisfy the same. Though one party has the estate for life and another the reversion, the lien will be enforced against the tenement insured by selling the whole fee simple title thereof, and the whole of the tenement, unless from the nature of the property it be practicable and expedient to lay off a portion thereof for sale. Before directing such sale, however, the respective personal liabilities of the several parties chargeable will be ascertained. And if the tenant for life advance the amount chargeable to the reversioner, as well as what is chargeable to himself, there will be no sale of the reversion, but a lien established thereon for reimbursement of the amount so advanced, with interest, to be enforced upon the falling in of the life estate.

NEW TRIAL.

What conviction will not be set aside as contrary to evidence.

1. Where a verdict of conviction in a criminal case is clearly against the evidence, or clearly without evidence to justify it, it is the duty of the court to set the verdict aside on the application of the prisoner, and to award him a new trial. But where, upon evidence merely circumstantial, the jury has found the prisoner guilty, and the court which tried the case has refused to grant a new trial, the verdict will not be disturbed by the general court, even though, in the opinion of that court, the evidence do not amount to very strong and clear proof.

NUNCUPATIVE WILL.

I. Last sickness of decedent, and commitment of testimony to writing.

1. What sickness will be considered the last sickness of the deceased, and what will be considered a commitment to writing of the testimony or the substance thereof, within the meaning of the statute concerning nuncupative wills, in 1 R. C. 1819, p. 377, § 7, 8.

II. How will may be impeached after probat.

2. The statute in 1 R. C. 1819, p. 378, § 13, which allows a person interested to appear within seven years after probat of a will, and by bill in chancery to contest the validity of the will, applies only to written and not to nuncupative wills.

S. C., 424

3. Where a nuncupative will has been proved before a court of competent jurisdiction, after fourteen days from the death of the testator, and after the widow has been summoned to contest the same, as directed by the act in 1 R. C. 1819, p. 379, § 18, the sentence of the court admitting the same to probat is binding upon her, and cannot be impeached except by appeal therefrom, or by a bill in equity founded upon her having been prevented by fraud or accident from making her defence in the court of probat.

III. Invalidity of will as to realty.

4. A nuncupative will is of no effect in law in relation to the testator's real estate, or the profits to accrue therefrom. But where, in the lifetime of the testator, a division was made between him and his two brothers of their father's real estate, which was acted upon by him in his lifetime by taking possession of the part allotted to him, and was also confirmed and ratified by him at the time of making his nuncupative will, the validity of such division was recognized in a court of equity. S. C., 425

IV. Construction and effect of will.

5. A testator, by a nuncupative will, gave to his wife certain slaves and articles of personalty, "exclusive of the portions of his estate she would be entitled to as his widow under the law." His wife being pregnant, he said he wished his estate to be kept together and managed by his brothers for the benefit of his wife and child during her widowhood, and in the event of her marriage he wished them to manage the child's part of the estate. If the child should live, and then die under age without lawful issue, he wished his brothers to have the whole of his estate in equal portions, except the slaves and articles specifically given to his wife. The child died in ten days after his birth, living the testator's brothers, who were the next of kin of the testator and of the child: held, that by the true construction of the will, the testator intended that his wife should have in absolute ownership the slaves and other personal property specifically bequeathed to her, together with her legal rights in his estate as his widow, and nothing more: that the child inherited the real estate, subject to the widow's right of dower therein, and was entitled under the will (after payment of debts) to the slaves not specifically bequeathed, subject to the widow's life estate in one-third thereof, and to distribution with the widow, in conformity to law, of the other personal estate not specifically bequeathed: and that, upon the death of the child, his interest 884 in the *real estate descended to his paternal uncles, and his interest in the slaves and other personal property passed to them under the executory bequest in their favour contained in the will. The party who sells the goods and takes the specialty is ignorant at the time that the merchant has a dormant partner. PATENT.

I. What patent for land settled is invalid.

1. Construction of the act in 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 86, § 40, p. 330, which declares that "no entry or location on any lands within this commonwealth, which have been settled thirty years prior to the date of such entry or location, and upon which quit-rents or taxes can be proved to have been paid at any time within the said thirty years, shall be deemed valid;" and relinquishes any title that the commonwealth may be supposed to have thereto.

Tichanal v. Roe, 288

2. In 1796, a person settled upon, cleared and improved a tract or land. In 1806, he conveyed a part of it by metes and bounds. And in 1834, the land embraced in this conveyance was granted by the commonwealth in conformity with a survey made in 1833. It appearing that the tenant claiming under the deed of 1806 had entered upon, settled and improved the land conveyed by this deed, and had, during the period he held it, paid the taxes thereon, and that a portion of this land was actually enclosed in 1796, when the tract of which it then formed a part was settled, held, it is competent for the tenant to connect his possession with the possession of those under whom he claims (the same never having been interrupted); and it thus appearing that the location on which the commonwealth's grant was founded was on lands which had been settled thirty years prior to the date of the location, and upon which taxes had been paid within that time, held, farther, that the location was invalid, and that no title passed by the commonwealth's grant. Code, ch. 171, § 16, that a convict received into the penitentiary is the same person mentioned in the record of a former conviction, and that he has not been sentenced to the punishment prescribed by law for his second offence, the court continues the case at several successive terms, in the absence and without the consent of the convict; after which he is brought into court for the first time, and his identity being duly ascertained, he is sentenced to the proper punishment of his second offense: held, such continuance of the case furnishes no ground of objection to the judgment.

Brooks v. Commonwealth, 845

2. Upon an enquiry, in pursuance of the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 171, § 16, whether a convict received into the penitentiary be the same person mentioned in the record of a former conviction, the prisoner has no right to challenge peremptorily any person called as a juror. S. C., 845

(falsifying the facts deposed to) "and so the defendant did, in manner and form aforesaid, commit wilful and corrupt perjury." On general demurrer to the indictment, held,

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

I. Power of attorney.

1. Construction of power of attorney to confess judgment. See Power of attorney, and

Calwell's v. Sheilds & Somerville, 305

II. What purchase by agent from principal will be set aside.

2. The doctrine of the english chancery, that a person standing in the confidential relation of agent cannot, while that relation continues and before that confidence is withdrawn, make a purchase from the principal (that will bind the latter) of a subject within the scope of the agency, recognized and acted upon.

3. A testator (amongst other things) directed lands to be sold, and legacies to be paid out of the proceeds. The administratrix with the will annexed, on whom the power of making the sale was conferred, appointed an agent, who did the business of the administration, and received the commissions allowed the administratrix. She was old, and had great confidence in him, and he acted in a great degree without her supervision, and practically conducted the administration without control. After several previous attempts by the agent to sell one of the parcels of land, it was put up at auction (as the sale bill announced) for the last time, and knocked down to a person requested by the agent to bid (for the purpose of promoting the sale) at 21 dollars 52 cents per acre, a higher bid than had been made on any previous occasion. Some persons present were willing to have given as much as 25 dollars per acre; and one of them, who was surprised when the land was knocked off and not to his bid, on the same day (immediately after the sale) stated to the agent his willingness to have gone higher if necessary. A few weeks afterwards, the agent purchased the land from the administratrix by private contract at 22 dollars per acre, and took a conveyance of it from her. This was in 1829. In 1835, a bill was filed by the legatees to rescind the sale and conveyance. The bill alleged that the proceeds of the sale were insufficient to pay the legacies, and it further alleged that most of the plaintiffs were non-residents who had not been in Virginia since the sale, and that some were infants and femes covert: held, 1. A purchase by such an agent is in substance no better than a purchase from himself, and though it might bind him, is not binding on the legatees, unless ratified by them deliberately and on full information. 2. No such ratification appearing, the delay in this case to impeach the purchase (due allowance being made for the infancy of some and the nonresidence of others) does not deprive the plaintiffs of their right to the aid of equity. 3. The extent of the interest of the plaintiffs ought by a proper account to be ascertained, to the end that the purchaser may, if he thinks proper so to do, remove *that interest by paying to the plaintiffs the parts unsatisfied of their legacies. 4. If the purchaser should not do this, the plaintiffs will be entitled to have the land reexposed to sale at a proper upset price, to be ascertained by debiting the purchaser with the profits of the land or with a fair annual rent therefor since his purchase, and crediting him first with his payments and interest on the same, and secondly with all his substantial and permanent improvements. The balance, with the addition thereto of a reasonable amount for the commission and charges of resale, is the sum at which the land should be set up, on a credit of 6, 12 and 18 months, bearing interest. 5. If the land and improvements should not sell for more than the upset price, the purchase should stand confirmed: if it should sell for more, then the former sale should be vacated, the purchase money on the resale duty collected from the purchaser at the same, and a conveyance made to him, and the proceeds of the resale applied, 1st. to pay the charges of sale; 2dly, to pay the first purchaser the balance due him upon an account stated as before mentioned; and the surplus to the legatees, according to their respective rights.

REGISTRY.

What registry of trust deed of personalty is invalid.

It was the intention of the legisla-

889 ture in the act of 1792 regulating *conveyances, (1 vol. of Old Revised Code, p. 157, § 2, 4,) to require a deed of trust or mortgage of personal estate to be recorded in the general court, or in the court of the district, county or corporation in which the grantor resided. Therefore where a deed of trust of personalty, dated the 15th of July 1812, stated the grantor to be of Henrico county, and the trustee and cestui que trust to be of the town of Petersburg, and the deed was never recorded in Henrico but only in Petersburg, and there was no evidence to shew that either at the date of the deed, or of its recordation in Petersburg, the grantor resided in that town, held, the deed so recorded is void as to the grantor's creditors.

Pending a suit in chancery by creditors for the sale of their debtor's land, the heirs of the debtor lease the land to a tenant for 3 years from the first of April, unless there shall in the mean time be a decree of sale, in which case the tenant is to give possession on the first of April after the decree. A rent is reserved of $300, to be paid at the end of each year of the tenancy. And according to the true construction of the lease, the tenant has a right to the crops growing on the land at the end of every year for which rent is reserved. In June of the third year, the land is sold under a decree in the creditors' suit, and the tenant applies to the purchasers for permission to proceed with the cultivation of the land; but one of the purchasers, in presence of the other (who had been one of the lessors), refuses, declaring that if the tenant sows the land, he the purchaser will reap the crop; and in consequence of this refusal the tenant proceeds no farther with his preparations for a fall crop, though he remains in possession of the land the third year. A few days before the expiration of that year, the purchasers sue out an attachment against the tenant for $300 rent to become due the first of April, upon the levy whereof the tenant gives to the sheriff bond and security for the rent. Judgment being obtained on this bond, the same is enjoined as to $200, upon the bill of the tenant praying an abatement of the rent according to equity: held by two judges, 1. that under the circumstances, the purchasers were not warranted in assuming the relation of landlord for the purpose of coercing the payment of the $300; 2. that there not having been an actual eviction, there was no remedy at law, and it was competent for the tenant to come into equity upon the ground that he was entitled to an abatement; and 3. the evidence justifying the allowance of $200 as a fair abatement, the injunction should be perpetuated.

Upon a bill in equity by a reversioner of slaves against the husband of tenant for life, alleging a purpose to remove one of the slaves out of the commonwealth, an injunction is awarded, and bond given by the husband with surety, conditioned to abide by and perform the final decree of the court. Upon an amended bill against the surety as well as the husband, it appears that the surety, while bound as such, and of course with full knowledge of the plaintiff's claim, caused the slave to be removed and sold out of the commonwealth, through the instrumentality of an agent: held, 1. That for such removal and sale in contempt and subversion of the court's authority, it is competent for the court to give redress and vindicate its jurisdiction by decreeing in favour of the plaintiff against both the obligors in the bond. 2. That the measure of relief is not for the value of the slave, but for the value of the plaintiff's reversionary estate in her, which should be ascertained by reference to a commissioner. 3. That the agent of the surety, by his agency in the removal and sale of the slave, would have subjected himself to the like decree, if he had known at the time of the claim of the plaintiff, and had confederated with the surety to defeat the same.

SPECIFIC EXECUTION.

I. What contract will be enforced against vendee.

1. In 1814 land was sold, possession thereof delivered, part of the purchase money paid, and a contract, made to pay a further part when a lawful right should be conveyed. In 1820 a bill was filed by the vendor and his wife (who claimed to have inherited the land from her father) against the vendees and their assignee, asking specific execution of the contract. The bill also made defendant a nonresident, who, it was alleged, had formerly owned the land, and conveyed it to the father by a deed which was accidentally destroyed before it was placed on record. The assignee in his answer said, he had heard a report that the father mortgaged the land to secure 892 *a debt which was yet unpaid. He professed his readiness to pay the balance due from him to the vendees, upon receiving a title to the land, and a release of the mortgage if there was one. The non-resident defendant, though proceeded against by publication, put in no answer. It was proved by a witness, that in 1794 the non-resident defendant conveyed the land to the father of the female complainant; that the deed was acknowledged before three witnesses, and delivered to one of them to have it recorded; and that it was accidentally burnt while in his possession. In 1830 a decree was made for specific execution.

During all this time the vendees and their assignee, and the heirs of the latter, continued to hold possession of the land; none of them asked a rescission of the contract; and it did not appear that there was any such mortgage as was mentioned in the answer. Upon an appeal by the heirs of the assignee: held, 1. That as the conveyance to the father, though never recorded, and afterwards destroyed, was effectual against the grantor to vest the legal title in the father, and the great lapse of time since that conveyance, in connexion with the uninterrupted possession of the father and those claiming under him, furnished a sufficient presumption against any claim on the part of the grantor's creditors, the decree for specific execution was, under the circumstances, proper. 2. That as there was no record of the said conveyance, a commissioner should be directed to execute another deed from the grantor to the appellants. 3. That as the ancestor of the appellants was not bound to take the title until the existence and validity of the said conveyance had been judicially ascertained, and as the burthen of establishing these facts devolved on the vendors, they should be decreed to pay the costs.

Wade's heirs v. Greenwood & wife, 474

II. What decree will be made against heirs of vendee.

2. Where a suit is brought against a vendee for specific execution, and pending the suit he dies, and the same is revived against his heirs, they are not liable to a personal decree: the decree should merely be, that unless they pay the purchase money and interest within a period to be prescribed, the land shall be sold.

Wade's heirs v. Greenwood & wife, 475

3. In a suit by a vendor against the vendee's heirs, to subject lands to sale by virtue of the vendor's lien for his purchase money, it is, in general, an improper exercise of discretion to decree an immediate sale without allowing any time for redemption, or to decree the sale to be made for cash. If circumstances exist which render it expedient to sell forthwith and for cash, such circumstances should be disclosed by the record. If there be a decree to sell forthwith and for ready money, in a case in which nothing appears to call for or justify a departure from the general rule, the decree will for this cause be reversed. S. C., 475

IV. Equitable relief to cestui que trust of bond secured by trust deed.

4. A testator having authorized a tract of land to be sold and the money put at interest for the benefit of his children, his executor sold the land and took a bond (secured by a deed of trust) to be paid the 21st of August 1820, with interest from the 25th of December 1817. On the 30th of October 1820, the executor received of the purchaser a sum of money, to be applied to the credit of the principal. The purchaser having sold part of the land and taken from his vendee four bonds, one payable the 16th of April 1821, and the others on the 25th of December in the years 1821, 1822 and 1823, the executor, on the 21st of January 1822, took an assignment of those bonds and of a deed of trust securing the same, and gave a receipt stating that they were to be credited in part of the principal at the dates at which those bonds were due. In June 1823, the purchaser joined the executor from selling under his deed of trust, upon the ground of a defect of title to two parcels of the land, one of 16½, the other of 100 acres, part of which last parcel being included in the sale to the subvendee, the alleged defect of title was made the ground also of injunction by him. In 1835, the injunction of the first purchaser was perpetuated as to the price of the 16½ acres, and dissolved as to the residuc, so far as it remained unpaid. The executor having in the mean time removed from the commonwealth, a bill was thereupon filed by some of the legatees, against the purchaser, the trustee in his deed of trust, the executor, and another legatee, to ascertain the balance due. The bill averred, that many years since, the bond payable to the executor was transferred to the legatee defendant, to collect for himself and the others interested, and he had removed from the state; that the complainants do not know where the bond is, or whether it is lost or destroyed; and that the trustee declines to advertise or sell, for want of the bond. As to all the defendants except the purchaser, the bill was taken for confessed: held, 1. Equity has jurisdiction; on the ground that the legatees, though entitled to the balance due from the *purchaser, are mere beneficiaries, having no legal right which they could assert at law; and also on the ground that, the case being one in which it would have been improper for the trustee to sell until some proceeding was had to ascertain the amount due, the creditors had a right to come into equity to have the amount ascertained. 2. The purchaser, having in his hands evidence of all the payments alleged by him, has no right to require that the bond shall be produced before an account is stated. 3. The payments which the executor agreed should be credited against the principal must be so applied; the case not being taken out of the influence of the principle laid down in Pindall's ex'x &c. v. The Bank of Marietta, 10 Leigh 484, by the circumstance that the party who so agreed was a fiduciary, nor by any of the other circumstances before mentioned.

III. Rights as distributee.

3. A testator dies possessed of slaves, to a third of which his widow, who renounces his will, is entitled during her life. In a settlement of the executorship account after the death of the executor, and after the widow's death, it appears by the appraisal that the slaves were seven in number. Two were specifically bequeathed by the testator, and the presumption is that they were delivered over to the legatees. Two were sold under execution of a creditor of the testator, before the executor had other assets in hand to pay the execution, and were purchased by the executor at the sheriff's sale. And two others were sold by the executor, though the payment of debts did not require the sale of them if the widow had paid up a sum of 792 dollars 48 cents, due from her for purchases of the testator's goods. When or for what prices these two were sold, did not appear. The record furnished no information of the disposition of the seventh slave; but the probability is that he was old and of little or no value: held, the charge for the widow's interest in the slaves, instead of being measured by their estimated hires, should be an annual sum from the death of her husband until her death, equal to the annual interest of one third of the gross amount of the sales or the value of the slaves: dissentiente Baldwin, J., who was of opinion that the widow was entitled to credit for one third annually of the estimated hires.

4. A testator, by his will, after directing that in the first place all his just debts shall be paid, devises and bequeaths to his wife, during her life, his plantation, all his stock and furniture, and six slaves by name; and then, after various specific devises and legacies to his children, directs as follows: "I desire that my wife will, as soon as convenient after my decease, purchase and deliver to my granddaughter C. C. a negro girl of about £50. price, which I give to my said granddaughter and her heirs." The wife is also named executrix. She qualifies as such, giving a bond with sureties; and the whole personal estate, other than specific legacies, is exhausted in payment of the debts. The widow having accepted the property given her by the will, and taken possession of the whole of it, held, she is liable personally as legatee, not as executrix, for the payment of the legacy to the granddaughter, and the sureties in her executorial bond are nowise responsible for the same.

5. A testator having six children, four the issue of a deceased wife, and two the issue of his present wife, devises to his two sons each a tract of land described by metes and bounds, directs that all his other lands shall be equally divided among his four daughters and their heirs, and then devises and bequeaths as follows: "My will is that my negroes be apportioned equally amongst my six children, under the following regulation, to say, that the one third thereof which shall be allotted to my wife as her dower shall be the full part of the two children I had by her, and also that the several negroes I have from time to time furnished any of my children be their right, but that they shall be each appraised and accounted for in their part of the division of my slaves. Lastly, I desire that all the residue of my estate not before specifically given be equally divided amongst my aforesaid six children." The will is made the 31st of December 1792, and the testator dies in 1794, prior to the 28th of October; between which periods, to wit, in November 1793, a third child of the testator by his second wife is born: held, 1. According to the authority of Yerby v. Yerby, 3 Call 334, the birth of such third child was not a revocation of the will. 2. As the will was published, and the testator died, before the passage of the act of 1794 providing for pretermitted children, the case does not fall within the operation of that statute. 3. Upon the true construction of the will, the afterborn child has no claim to share in the division of the dower slaves after the death of the widow.

WRIT OF RIGHT.

I. Matter of abatement.

1. Within what time the plea of several tenancy should be pleaded in a writ of right.

Walkers v. Boaz &c., 485

2. Upon a writ of right by three demandants, it appears at the trial of the mise, that the tenement demanded descended to the demandants and their two infant brothers from their mother, and that those two infants successively died without issue, and were survived by their father as well as by the demandants: held, 1. That upon the death of the infant who first died, his share of the tenement descended to his four brothers, without regards to the father; and upon the death of the other infant, the share which he derived by descent from the mother passed in like manner to the three brothers, but the share which he derived by descent from his brother (1-4th of 1-5th) descended to his father. 2. That according to the principles established in Garrard &c. v. Henry &c., 6 Rand. 110, and Linton and others v. Bartly and others, 9 Leigh 444, the fact of the father's having so become interested as tenant in common with the demandants (not having been pleaded in abatement) cannot prevent the demandants from recovering so much of the tenement as they shew title to, namely, all except that fourth of a fifth. S. C., 485

II. Seisin of demandant.

3. The decision in Green v. Watkins, 7 Wheat. 27, that in a writ of right, where the demandant shews no seisin by a pedis positio, but relies wholly on a constructive seisin by virtue of a patent of the land as vacant land, it is competent for the tenants to disprove that constructive seisin by shewing that the state had previously granted the same land to other persons, with whom the tenants claim no privity, approved and acted on.

Dawson v. Watkins, 259

4. The demandant in a writ of right claims the land (of which the tenant is in possession) under a patent bearing date the 17th of June 1786, and the tenant disproves the constructive seisin of the demandant, by shewing a patent for a large tract embracing the same land, which issued as early as the first of December 1773. Whereupon the demandant, to establish a seisin in deed by a pedis positio, proves that the patentee under whom he claims came, in 1824 or 1825, to the county in which the land lies, and employed an agent to enter upon and survey the said land and various others tracts in the same county; that the said agent procured a surveyor and chain carriers immediately thereafter, who went upon the land in questions, and surveyed and re-marked the same for the patentee: held, these facts are not sufficient to authorize a jury to find a seisin in the demandant. ABATEMENT.

1. Within what time the plea of several tenancy should be pleaded in a writ of right. Walkers v. Boaz & others, 485
2. Nonjoinder of a demandant in a writ of right must be pleaded in abatement. See Writ of right No. 2, and S. C., 485
3. Matter of abatement either shews the action to be abatable, or that it is de facto abated. The former usually exists at the time of the suit; the latter for the most part occurs during its progress. The first must be pleaded in technical form, and at a proper stage of the cause. The last may be, but need not be, pleaded; and when apparent, or made known to the court, will be declared by its order in any stage of the suit. ANSWER.

- I. Bringing in defendant.
 1. Case in which a defendant was brought in by a messenger to answer interrogatories. Johns v. Davis's ex'or and others, 729
- II. Weight of answer as evidence.
 2. It is a rule in equity that the answer of a defendant denying the allegations of the bill must be taken as true unless disproved by two witnesses, or by one witness and circumstances in his support: it is not in the power of a plaintiff to make his case an exception to this rule by stating in his bill that he expects to prove its allegations, and disclaiming a discovery from the defendant.
Thornton v. Gordon &c., 719
 3. A bill is filed to injoin the sale of property conveyed to secure a debt alleged to be usurious, and the plaintiff avers that he expects to make full proof of his allegations, and disclaims all benefit of any discovery from the defendant. The injunction is awarded. But afterwards the defendant files an answer denying the allegation of the bill. And the plaintiff relies on the testimony of a single witness, unsustained by any corroborating circumstances: held, the injunction must be dissolved and the bill dismissed.

5. When objection that sheriff is no party to bill for satisfaction out of insolvent's estate will not avail in appellate court. See Codefendants No. 2, and S. C., 590

IV. Reversal.

6. A decree being rendered against the sureties of an executor, and the appellate court being of opinion that they are not liable, decree reversed and bill dismissed as to all of them, although only one had appealed. But though a sum, (less than 100 dollars) was erroneously decreed against a succeeding administrator, as to whom the bill ought to have been dismissed, yet he not having appealed, no correction was made by the appellate court in this part of the decree, the appellant being in no wise interested therein.

8. Case in which it was considered in the appellate court, that a guardian, who had been culpably in default in failing to render any account of his receipts or disbursements, was allowed by the court below more 853 for *the board and clothing of his ward than he was entitled to; but as a particular sum payable by the ward had not been charged in the court below, it was deemed best to consider that as an equivalent for the excess of the charge for board and clothing, and (saving the parties the delay and expense of restating the guardian's account) to terminate the case by affirming the decree.

ASSIGNMENT.

I. Evidence of consideration.

1. A share of the proceeds of a testator's estate being bequeathed to a feme covert, and her husband having assigned the same, a bill is filed by the assignee, which alleges that the assignment was in consideration of 1500 dollars. The executor and the feme both answer, but the answers do not deny the consideration, or call for proof of it; and the deed of assignment purports on its face to be in consideration of 1500 dollars. It seems, there being no such denial or call for proof, the deed is prima facie evidence of the allegation in the bill. Accord. Scott & wife &c. v. Gibbon & co. &c., 5 Munf. 86.

AWARD.

I. What submission is binding and entitles to specific execution of award.

1. An equitable title to land of which an intestate died seized being set up 854 *against his heirs, some of the heirs and the claimants enter into an agreement under seal, referring the matter to arbitration, and the arbitrators award in favour of the claimants, and direct a conveyance by the heirs of their interest in the land to the claimants: held, it was competent for the adult heirs who were sui juris to enter into the submission, notwithstanding there were other heirs interested in the subject who were not parties; that the award made in pursuance of such submission is binding on the parties to such submission, according to the terms thereof; and that, upon a bill in equity for the purpose, specific execution may be decreed against such parties to the submission, and a conveyance compelled of such legal title to the land as has descended to them respectively. Accord. Smith and others v. Smith &c., 4 Rand. 95.

BAIL.

What is no ground for letting to bail.

A prisoner having been examined by the county court and remanded for trial for the offence of feloniously passing two counterfeit half eagles, one of them to J. C. and the other to W. M., two indictments are found against him, in one of which he is charged with passing one of the counterfeit coins to

J. C. on the 13th of October 1842, in the other with passing the other coin to W. M. on the same day. Upon a trial of one of the indictments, the jury find the prisoner not guilty: held, his acquittal in that case does not entitle him to be let to bail in the other. Summerfield v. Commonwealth, 767

BANKS.

When not entitled to credit with commonwealth for premium on specie.

The banks of this commonwealth in which the public moneys were on deposit, paid the interest falling due in January 1840 upon public loans, in specie or its equivalent. Under the proviso to the second section of the act of March 28, 1838, (Sess. Acts of 1838, p. 27, ch. 13,) they claimed credit in account with the commonwealth for the premium which they had to pay to the public creditors for the then difference between specie and the notes of the banks: held, 1. That under the acts in 2 R. C. of 1819, ch. 174, § 6, p. 2, and in Sess. Acts of 1838, p. 27, ch. 14, the claim of any bank for such premium may properly be presented to the first auditor. 2. That upon the disallowance of such claim, the bank may file a petition for redress to the court of chancery for Henrico and Richmond, created by the act of March 13, 1841, in Sess. Acts of 1840-41, p. 65, ch. 48. 3. That according to the true construction and effect of the act of December 11, 1839, in Sess. Acts of 1839-40, p. 52, ch. 63, (especially of the first proviso thereto) the claim of any bank for the premium so paid must be disallowed; dissentiente Brooke, J., on the last point.

3. In an action of debt brought in 1837 by an administrator against an executor, upon a bond of the 10th of January 1833, payable the first of January 1834, the defendant offered as a setoff a bond of the plaintiff's intestate to the defendant's testator, dated the 5th of April 1820 and payable on demand, with two endorsements thereon, admitted by the plaintiff to be in the handwriting of the defendant's testator, one of which credited a sum paid in part on the 855 *first of June 1828, and the other credited another payment in part on the 5th of May 1829. The circuit court, at the instance of the plaintiff, instructed the jury, that after the lapse of 16 years from the date of the said bond, the jury might, from this aided by other circumstances, presume it paid; and, at the instance of the defendant, instructed the jury, that such presumption of payment might be repelled by other circumstances. The defendant relying upon the endorsements aforesaid upon the bond, and there being no proof of the time at which they were made, except that it appeared the defendant's testator died in 1833, the circuit court, at the instance of the plaintiff, instructed the jury, that the said endorsements were not circumstances to be taken into consideration by the jury to repel the presumption: held, as the endorsements must have been made within the period of about 13 years from the time the bond was due, the circuit court clearly erred in its last instruction. Tavener v. Robinson, 280

CODEFENDANTS.

I. Answer of one no evidence against another.

I. It is a general rule, that the answer of one defendant in chancery is not evidence against his codefendant. From this rule there is no exception of the answer of an assignor; not even though the bond assigned be alleged to have been given on a gaming consideration. The fact of its being on such consideration cannot be established against a defendant who is the assignee, by the answer of his codefendant the obligee and assignor. Accord. Hoomes v. Smock, 1 Wash. 389; Dade's adm'r v. Madison, 5 Leigh 401.

Pettit v. Jennings &c., 676

II. Decree against one in favour of another.

2. A party having covenanted to pay a sum of money in trust for the benefit of the covenantee and his wife and children, the covenantee afterwards takes the oath of insolvency, and transfers to the sheriff, for the benefit of the creditor, his interest under the covenant. Upon a bill by the creditor against the covenantor, the covenantee, and the wife and children of the latter, (the sheriff not being made a party), the court decrees that the covenantor pay to a trustee, appointed by consent of the other defendants and the plaintiff, the money secured by the covenant, and directs the trustee to 856 invest the *same, and out of the interest pay the plaintiff the amount of his debt. From this decree the covenantor alone appeals: held, 1. The objection that the sheriff was no party to the suit, not having been taken in the court below, cannot be made a ground in the appellate court for reversing the decree. 2. The decree was properly rendered in favour of the codefendants of the covenantor, as well as in favour of the plaintiff. 3. The appellant, being bound by his covenant to pay the money has no interest in the question how it shall be applied, and therefore is not entitled to make the objection that the fund secured by the covenant was not liable to the creditor of the covenantee.

CONSTABLES.

Effect of constable's receipt as evidence.

In an action against a constable and the sureties in his official bond, for failing to pay over debts entrusted to the constable and received by him from the debtors, the receipt of the constable for the debts, signed in his official character, is, according to the true construction of the act passed March 8, 1826, concerning constables and their securities, prima facie evidence, as well against the sureties as against the constable, of the receipt of the money; provided six months have elapsed between the date of the receipt and the commencement of the action. Per Allen and Baldwin, J. But the fact that the receipt of the constable was signed in his official character, must appear in some way on the face of the paper itself; if it do not, the party claiming under the receipt cannot obtain the benefit of the act by oral testimony of the character in which the receipt was signed. CORPORATION.

I. Effect of extinction of corporation plaintiff; and what judgment estops from alleging previous extinction.

1. If a corporation become extinct by the expiration of the term of its corporate existence, pending a suit at law for a corporate demand, and that fact be brought regularly before the court in which the suit is pending, the action must terminate. It is equally clear that if, after judgment in favour of a corporation, the corporation becomes extinct by the expiration of the term of existence granted by the charter, no execution on such judgment can regularly be sued out in the name of the corporation, and if one be sued out, it is liable to be quashed, on shewing the fact of the extinction of the corporation before the emanation of the execution. On the other hand, if an original judgment be rendered in favour of a corporation, as it could not be regularly rendered unless the existence of the corporation continued, the necessary intendment from the rendition of it is, that the continued existence of the corporation was either proved or admitted; and if execution be sued out on the judgment, the defendant, being by this intendment estopped to deny the existence at the time of the judgment, would not, on a motion to quash the execution, be admitted to controvert this intendment, and proof on such motion of the extinction of the corporation before judgment, would be inadmissible or unavailing. Per Stanard, J.

May &c. v. State bank of N. Carolina, 56

II. What judgment does not estop from alleging previous extinction.

2. In an action by a corporation, a special verdict was rendered, which found, that by the act creating the corporation, it was to continue until the 1st of January 1830, and that by a subsequent act the charter was extended until the first of January 1835. Other facts were found in relation to the merits of the claim, upon which the circuit court, on the 24th of October 1831, gave judgment for the defendants. An assignment of the claim was made by the corporation on the 6th of December 1831. Whereupon, to wit in June 1832, a supersedeas was obtained to the judgment, upon a petition in the name of the corporation. In April 1837, the court of appeals reversed the judgment, and entered judgment for the plaintiffs; and in May 1837, judgment was entered in the circuit court in pursuance thereof. Execution being then issued, one of the defendants gave a forthcoming bond with surety, which was forfeited. Upon this bond a motion was made for award of execution in the name of the corporation, and the defendants produced the acts before mentioned, to shew that the charter expired on the 1st of January 1835; and this prima facie evidence of the extinction of the corporation was not met by any countervailing proof on the other side; but it was insisted that the judgment of the appellate court imported that the corporation was in existence at that time, and estopped the defendants from shewing the contrary: held, that according to The Bank of Alexandria v. Patton and others, 1 Rob. 499, had the attempt been made, when this case was in the appellate court, to arrest further proceedings therein on the ground that the charter had expired, it would have been fruitless; and as the judgment of the appellate court could not have been prevented by shewing that the charter had expired, so there cannot be a legal intendment of the existence of the corporation, from the fact of the judgment being rendered. The forthcoming bond and the execution under which it was taken were therefore quashed, and the assignee left to proceed in equity to obtain the benefit of the judgment: dissentiente Baldwin, J.

DOWER.

I. When precluded by sale under vendor's lien.

1. The vendor of land conveys the same to the vendee in fee simple, and receives part of the purchase money, but no security for the residue. On a bill in equity against the vendee to enforce the implied equitable lien of the vendor, a decree is made for the sale of the land, and the proceeds are more than sufficient to satisfy what remains due to the vendor. The surplus is claimed by creditors of the vendee who have obtained judgments against him, and taken him in execution, from which he escaped. With the vendee's assent, a decree is made in favour of those creditors for the surplus. Afterwards, the vendee dying, a bill is filed by his widow against those in possession of the land, to wit, one to whom the purchaser at the sale under the decree had aliened the whole, and two others to whom that one had aliened a part, claiming to be endowed: held by two judges (Stanard and Baldwin) that the land *in the hands of the purchasers is not chargeable to the widow, and that her bill must be dismissed; dissentiente Allen, J., whose opinion was, that the widow was entitled to dower in the surplus which remained after satisfying the vendor's lien, and that the amount to which she was entitled constituted a charge upon the land in the hands of the purchaser at the sale under the decree, and of those claiming under him.

III. Right to dower in woodland.

3. A husband dies seized of land incapable of cultivation, and no otherwise productive or valuable than by working the timber and making sale thereof when converted into shingles. It appears that previous to as well as after the husband's death, the timber was worked, and large profits derived from the sale of shingles. Parties coming into possession after the husband's death, under a deed of trust made by him in his lifetime, admit his widow's right as dowress to one third of the timber worked, and for several years pay her one third of the proceeds of the same. Payment is afterwards stopped: held, those in possession of the land after the husband's death shall account to the widow or her administrator for one third of the profits received by them during her life, subject to credit for the payments made by them to the widow.

IV. Right to recover profits from husband's death.

4. Where a husband makes a deed of trust conveying land with power to the trustees to sell the same for payment of debts, and they allow the husband to remain in possession during his life, and make no sale under the deed until after his death, the husband is to be considered as having died seized of the land subject to the deed of trust, so that his widow, if she did not join in the deed, and is entitled to dower in the land, may recover rents and profits from the husband's death in like manner as if the deed had not been made. In case the widow die before recovering such rents and profits, the same may be recovered to the period of her death by her administrator.

V. Mode of enjoying dower in proceeds of land sold.

5. The principle laid down in Herbert and others v. Wren and others, 7 Cranch 380, that where land in which there is a right of dower is sold in a suit to which the tenant in dower is a party, the other parties interested "have a right to insist that instead of a sum in gross, one third of the purchase money shall be set apart, and the interest thereof paid annually to the tenant in dower during her life," approved.

Wilson &c. v. Davisson, 384

VI. Mode of calculating present value of dower interest.

6. The table of longevity referred to, which was made by professor Wigglesworth of Cambridge university, and published in the Transactions of the American academy, vol. 2, p. 133, and also republished in the American Jurist, vol. 11, p. 492, and in 2 Rob. Pract. p. 381. When the present value of a dower interest is to be calculated, the probable duration of the life by which it is limited and the sum derived from it annually, are first to be ascertained, and then the calculation is to be made, not by discounting simple interest, but by discounting compound interest. For the present value of an annuity is that sum which, being improved at compound interest, will be sufficient to pay the annuity.

VII. What laches will preclude right to account.

7. Under a deed of trust of land made by a husband, the trustees after his death sell the land, and the purchaser conveys it away to others. A bill is afterwards filed by the widow against the trustees, the purchaser's executor, and those in possession, claiming dower in the land, and an account of profits; pending which suit the widow dies. 861 The bill *upon its face shews a delay, without excuse, of more than 20 years in calling the trustees and the purchaser's executor to an account. The surviving trustee swears positively that he has paid over to the widow every dollar for which he and his cotrustee were accountable, and exhibits vouchers in proof of his allegation. The widow, by her own shewing in the bill, prosecuted to recovery a suit against the executor of the purchaser, for her share of the profits received by him; and the only pretext for a further demand, and that without a shadow of proof, is that she did not recover enough: held, the plaintiff is entitled to no account as regards the trustees and the purchaser's executor, and the bill was properly dismissed as to them.

ELEGIT.

Lien of elegit on land conveyed in trust, and rights of elegit creditor against purchaser under the deed.

1. Under a deed of trust conveying land with general warranty to secure debts, the land is sold for more than enough to pay those debts. The purchaser institutes a proceeding against the grantor for unlawful detainer, and obtains a judgment against him. And then the purchaser insists, 1. that he was not bound to pay his purchase money (and therefore cannot be charged with interest on the same) until he obtained possession; and 2. that he may retain part of the surplus of the purchase money to pay the costs recovered by the judgment on his complaint for unlawful detainer. The claims of the purchaser are objected to by a creditor of the grantor, who obtained a decree against him after the deed of trust, and sued out an elegit within the year: held (per totam curiam) the claims so made by the purchaser cannot be allowed.—The purchaser further claims to apply other parts of the surplus to extinguish a dower right in the property existing at the time of the warranty, and to pay taxes assessed on the property before the sale was made: held by two judges (dissentiente Stanard, J.) these claims also must be disallowed.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

I. Commissions and other charges.

1. As a general rule, an executor is not entitled to commission on the amount of debt due from him to the testator, and credited to the estate in the executorial account. Accord. Carter's ex'ors v. Cutting and wife, 5 Munf. 227.

Farneyhough's ex'ors v. Dickerson &c., 582

2. The commission of an executor should not be on the amount of his disbursements. He ought generally to be allowed a commission on the amount of the credits in his account, except on a credit for a debt due from him to the testator. Though some of the credits are for bonds due the estate, that were passed over by the executor to legatees, and voluntarily received by the latter, commissions will nevertheless be allowed the executor on the amount of such bonds.

S. C., 582

3. An item of $21, paid by executors for services rendered by a clerk, being allowed by commissioners, the same was excepted to by legatees, upon the ground that what the clerk did ought to have been done by the executors, and therefore that he should be paid out of their commissions. The record contained no evidence on the subject, except that the date of the item was a few days after the date of a large credit for sales at public auction, which furnished some ground for the inference that the clerk was employed during those sales: held, the court of probate did not err in overruling the exception.

FERRY.

I. Effect of inquisition on application to establish ferry.

1. Construction of the act in 2 R. C. 1819, p. 261, ch. 238, which provides for the impaneling of a jury to say whether, in their opinion, public convenience will result from the establishment of a proposed ferry, and for the return of this opinion to the county court, "who thereupon, as well as upon any other evidence that may be offered, shall have full power to establish such ferry." The finding of the jury in which a case is merely evidence, and the weight of it, under all the circumstances, a matter for the discretion of the court.

Muire &c. v. Smith, 458

II. What is no ground for quashing such inquisition.

2. Upon the return of the certificate of a jury, that, in their opinion, public convenience would result from the establishment of a proposed ferry, evidence is introduced, 1. Of one of the jurors, who proved, that before he was sworn, he had made up an opinion that the ferry would be a public convenience; that he thought it probable he might have expressed this opinion, though he did not recollect to have done so; that he had, before he was sworn, signed a petition for the said ferry; and that, at the time he was sworn, he was uninfluenced by the said opinion, and prepared to render an impartial verdict. 2. Of another juror, who proved the like facts with regard to himself, and also that he had expressed his opinion. 3. Of another juror, who proved the same facts with regard to himself that the second had proved with regard to himself, and also that he had circulated a petition for the ferry. Upon this evidence the county court quashed the finding of the jury, and the circuit court reversed the judgment of the county court: held, the judgment of the circuit court is right.

Muire &c. v. Smith, 458

III. Declaration in case for disturbance of franchise.

3. A declaration in case by the owner of a ferry for the disturbance of his franchise, contains two counts, each of which is demurred to. The first count sets forth, in substance, that the plaintiff was possessed of a legally established ferry; that there were good and convenient roads, ways and landings for the use of the same; and that there was, and of right ought to have been, a free and uninterrupted passage for the water flowing in and down the river, so as not to affect or injure the landings, ways or roads at the ferry: and it charges that the defendants wrongfully placed obstructions in the river near the ferry and landings, by which the current of the stream was checked and diverted, and thrown from and upon the landings (in modes particularly described); thereby occasioning the plaintiff great labour and expense, destroying or injuring the roads and landings, rendering the embarkation and debarkation difficult, and preventing the transportation of persons and property. The second count is the same, except that, instead of alleging a possession of the ferry by the plaintiff, *it avers his right to the reversion thereof, expectant upon the term of his tenant, in whom the possession, use and enjoyment are charged to be, and that the grievance complained of is to the prejudice of the plaintiff's reversionary estate: held, both counts are good on general demurrer: dissentiente Allen, J., who was of opinion as to the second count, that it not being for the accruing damages consequent upon the obstruction, but by the reversioner for an injury to the inheritance, it could not be sustained without an averment in it of possession of the landings, or of some right to their use.

Patrick v. Ruffners, 209

IV. What proof will maintain such action.

4. In an action by the grantee of a ferry against a wrongdoer who disturbs the enjoyment of his franchise, the grant of the franchise from the public, the use of the ferry with its appurtenant landings and outlets, and the fact of such disturbance, are all that need be established. Nor is it material whether the disturbance is by invading the plaintiff's right to the exclusive transportation and tolls, or by obstructing or impairing his navigation, or by destroying or injuring the landings and outlets. Per Baldwin, J.

Patrick v. Ruffners, 209

FIERI FACIAS.

I. Effect of return as evidence in action against sheriff.

1. In debt on a sheriff's official bond, two breaches are assigned: 1. that the sheriff had levied an execution of the relator against an administrator, on slaves of the decedent, but negligently suffered them to be eligned and carried off: 2. that the sheriff might have levied the execution on such slaves, but neglected so to do. At the trial, the plaintiff, to shew the issuing of the execution, and the reception and disposition thereof by the sheriff, was under the necessity of giving in evidence not only the execution with the return originally made thereon, but also an amendment of that return, made by leave of court. This amendment had been made not by obliterating the first return and substituting another in its place, but in a more proper manner by making an addition to the first return; and the return thus constituted of that originally made, and of what was afterwards added, was upon its face contradictory in itself: held, that the defendant had a right to rely upon said return as prima facie evidence in his favour; that the plaintiff, on the other hand, was at liberty to disprove any part of it, as well by intrinsic evidence furnished by the return itself, as by evidence aliunde; that it was competent for the defendant in like manner to sustain any part of the return; and it was the province of the jury to decide, upon the whole evidence furnished by the return or otherwise, whether or not the execution was levied by the sheriff upon the property of the intestate in the hands of the administrator, and the same thereafter eligned and lost by the negligence of the sheriff; or whether or not the sheriff might have levied upon such property in the hands of the administrator, but neglected so to do.

Lathrop v. Lumpkin &c., 49

II. Effect of sale under second of two fi. fas.

2. Whilst on the one hand, where an officer holding two executions sells under the second, the title of the purchaser is good against the plaintiff in the first, and the remedy of the latter is against the officer, so on the other hand the purchaser at such sale cannot invoke the lien of the first execution, in aid of a title acquired at a sale made under the second. Therefore, where a slave was levied upon under a fi. fa. delivered to a constable before any conveyance of the slave by the debtor, and other executions issued after such conveyance, under which (and not under the first fi. fa.) the evidence tended to prove that the slave was sold, it was held, in an action brought by the grantee in the conveyance against the purchaser at the sale, that the title of the purchaser must be referred to the process under which the sale was made. Accord. Eckhols v. Graham & others, 1 Call 492.

M'Key &c. v. Garth, 33

III. Action against sheriff purchasing at his own sale under fi. fa.

3. The owner of a slave sells her, but remains in possession. The slave is afterwards levied upon under execution, 866 *and the vendee forbidding the sheriff to sell, the creditor gives an indemnifying bond with security, and then the slave is sold by the sheriff, and the sheriff becomes himself the purchaser, though at the time in the name of another. In an action of detinue by the first vendee against the sheriff so purchasing, held, the question whether a sheriff can acquire title by a purchase at his own sale does not arise, but the proper enquiry is whether the title of the plaintiff is valid against the execution creditor.

Tavener v. Robinson, 280

C. of 1819, ch. 115, p. 455, that another had forcibly turned him out of possession of a tenement, the jury returned a special verdict finding the facts, and upon those facts the court considered that the entry was not "with strong hand or with multitude of people," and rendered judgment that the complaint be dismissed.

Pauley v. Chapman, 235

FOREIGN ATTACHMENT.

When assignee's plea that the debtor was resident is demurrable.

In a suit in equity in the circuit court of Russell, against an absent debtor having lands within the commonwealth, after a valuation of the lands had been made and returned, two persons filed petitions, setting forth that they had purchased the lands from the debtor and received conveyances of the same, and praying to be made defendants. The court ordered the plaintiff to amend his bill and make them parties, which was accordingly done. Whereupon they filed a plea alleging, that at the time the subpoena was sued out, the debtor was a resident of the county of Russell and state of Virginia, subject to the process of the common law courts of said county, and possessed of personalty sufficient to discharge the debts due by him to the plaintiff. To this plea the plaintiff demurred: held, the demurrer should be sustained: for the petition is only a part of the case for the purpose of having the petitioners made defendants; and so far as the record discloses, they may have been mere strangers, having no right to intermeddle. Whether the debtor was nonresident or not, was a question foreign to them, until by their answers they had shewn they had an interest in the controversy.

Smith v. Hunt &c., 206

FORGERY.

I. Of what writing forgery cannot be committed.

1. Indictment for forging, with intent to defraud W. & W., a letter in the following terms: "Nottaway, April 24, 1841. Gent. Agreeable to mr. Wm. I. Watkins' request, I take pleasure in making you acquainted with his name, and would say to you that he is very extensively engaged in the manufacturing of tobacco, and has made some large purchases, and says that he wishes to patronize you (on my recommendation). You may be assured that whatever he engages to do he will certainly perform. He says it is probable he will want 1000 dollars by the 1st of May, to meet his engagements, and if he apply for the amount, I have no doubt but you will accommodate him. The roads are in such a condition that it is impossible to get any produce to market. Write me a few lines by mr. Watkins, and say what the chance is for a rise in tobacco. Your compliance with the above will very much oblige your ob't servant, Joseph M. Foulkes.—P. S. Mr. Watkins prefers giving a negotiable note payable in Petersburg Exchange bank, where he can always have an opportunity to send at the shortest notice and draw. He is not a gentleman of a low mean degree, but one that is a perfect gentleman in every sense of the term. I am confident, as I have observed to him, that you will either *let him have the money, or endorse for him. J. M. F." : held, this is not a writing in respect whereof forgery can be committed, either at common law or under the statute.

Foulkes v. Commonwealth, 837

II. Party whose signature is forged need not be called.

2. Upon a trial for forgery of a written instrument, the commonwealth may, without producing as a witness the party by whom the instrument purports to be signed, and without accounting for his absence, prove by the evidence of other witnesses that the instrument is not genuine; such evidence not being in its nature secondary to that of the party whose signature is in question.

Foulkes v. Commonwealth, 836

III. Secondary proof of forged instrument

3. On trial of indictment for forgery of a letter of credit with intent to defraud W. & W., the commonwealth proves that a draft, presented by the prisoner to W. & W. at the same time with the letter of credit, had been filed, together with an indictment against the prisoner for forging the same, with the clerk of the court, who, on making search for the draft among the papers in his office, has been unable to find it; and thereupon the commonwealth offers secondary evidence of the contents of the draft; no notice having been given to the prisoner, before the jury was impaneled, of any intention to offer such evidence: held, the foundation so laid for the admission of the secondary evidence is sufficient.

Foulkes v. Commonwealth, 836, 7

FORMER RECOVERY.

What defence of a former recovery for the same cause of action is not sustained.

In assumpsit for work and labour done, care and diligence bestowed, and materials provided, the defendant, besides the general issue, pleaded a former action for not performing the same promises, in which the plaintiff recovered damages for the nonperformance of the same: the plaintiff replied that the promises were not the same identical promises in respect whereof the judgment was recovered, and tendered an issue, which was joined. At the trial, the plaintiff having given evidence on the general issue, the defendant, to sustain his plea of former recovery, gave in evidence the record of the former suit, the declaration in which contained two counts, one for work and labour, care and diligence, and materials, as well as for goods sold, money lent, money paid, and money received; and the other upon an account stated. The defendant also gave in evidence the account filed in that case, which contained credits and charges up to the 24th of October 1835, "leaving out the building of a large barn, and work done on a new mill." The verdict and judgment in that case being for $630.53 cents, the plaintiff examined a witness, who proved that an account was settled with the defendant in October 1835, on which a balance of $630.53 cents was struck; that the account filed in the former cause was a copy of the account so settled; and that the settlement did not include the plaintiff's demand for work done on the barn or the new mill, charged in the account in the second case, but that this demand remained for future adjustment. It was farther proved, that on the trial in the former cause, the account not being then filed which was afterwards filed in the second suit, all evidence in regard to that account was excluded, and the plaintiff rested his case on the count upon an account stated, and relied upon the settlement before mentioned, shewing the said balance of $630.53 cents, and recovered upon that ground only. Thereupon

the defendant moved the court to exclude from the jury all the evidence offered by the plaintiff in support of the items charged in the account filed in the second case, on the ground that he was precluded from recovering the same in this action by the recovery in the former suit, and that the demand of the plaintiff for the said sum of $630.53 cents recovered in the former suit, and for the items charged in the account filed in this case, was one entire demand, and could not be made the subject of two separate suits, and therefore the plaintiff was precluded by the recovery in the former suit from recovering in this suit. But the court 868 *overruled the motion, and a verdict was rendered for the sum found by the jury to be due upon the account filed in the second case. On a supersedeas to the judgment given on this verdict, the same was affirmed.

FREEHOLD.

A lot of land being sold for a sum of money payable by instalments, the vendee receives immediate possession, and the vendor signs, seals, and acknowledges before magistrates, a conveyance of the land to the vendee in fee simple, which is thereupon, by consent of the parties, placed in the keeping of a third person, to be retained by him until the whole purchase money is paid, and to be then delivered to the vendee. II. Liability of obligor in gaming bond to assignee.

2. Though, upon a bill in equity by an obligor against the obligee and his assignee, it be fully proved that the bond was given for a gaming consideration, still the obligor will not be discharged from liability to the assignee, if the assignee had no knowledge before the bond was assigned of its having been executed for money won at play, and was induced to purchase the same by the assurances of the obligor that there was no objection to it and that it would be paid. Per Baldwin, J. Accord. Buckner &c. v. Smith &c., 1 Wash. 296; Hoomes v. Smock, 1 Wash. 389; Davis's adm'r v. Thomas &c., 5 Leigh 1. Under such circumstances, the only question is as to the amount of the obligor's liability to the assignee. V. Process on indictment for playing.

5. A party being indicted for playing at an unlawful game, the court immediately awards a capias against him, returnable the next day; at the return day, he moves to quash the capias as improper process, which motion the court overrules, and compels him to plead forthwith: held, the irregularity (if any) in this proceeding is no sufficient ground to reverse judgment against the defendant.

GUARDIAN AND WARD.

I. Action against guardian for necessities.

1. In an action brought by keepers of a boarding school against a guardian, for board, tuition, and other necessities furnished to the ward, the administrator of a previous guardian is a competent witness for the plaintiffs. But if it appear that the board, tuition, and other necessities were furnished at the request of the previous guardian, and no express promise has been made by the second guardian to pay therefor, the action against the second guardian for the same cannot be maintained.

II. Liability of ex'or guardian de facto.

2. For several years an infant legatee resides with and is maintained by her grandmother, who is chargeable with the payment of the legacy, the annual interest of which is less than the annual value of the maintenance: held, the grandmother shall not be charged with interest on the legacy during the period of such maintenance.

Arrington v. Cheatham & wife, 492

III. Decree in suit by ward distributee against guardian adm'r.

3. The administrator of an intestate is also guardian of one of the distributees. Upon the termination of the guardianship, a bill is filed against the guardian and his sureties, to recover what is due upon the guardianship account. An amended bill is afterwards filed against the administrator and his sureties, to recover what is due on the administration account. Reports are made of both accounts. But, for reasons appearing to the court, the guardianship account is recommitted; and then, by consent of parties, the administration account is also recommitted. A further report is made upon the guardianship account, and none upon the administration account. Whereupon the cause is heard as to the guardian and his sureties, upon the further report so made, and a decree is entered against them for the sum deemed by the court to be due upon the guardianship account. From this decree an appeal is taken by a party interested to get rid of or reduce the amount. In the appellate court it is urged by the appellee, that the balance stated as due on the guardian's account should be augmented, by incorporating in it the appellee's share of the balance due on the administration account: held, this claim cannot be sustained: 1st, because the case was heard and the decree rendered between the parties *to, and on the claim made by, the original bill for the settlement of the guardianship account, as contradistinguished from the administration account, the settlement of which was sought by the amended bill: 2dly, because the case was not prepared for hearing as to the administration account; it standing, as to that account, on a consent order recommitting the same, and the record of course furnishing no account on which a definite charge or decree in respect to the administration account could be made: 3dly, because no claim was made in the court below by the appellee, to bring into the guardianship account any charge against the guardian arising out of the administration account.

HEARING OF CAUSE.

I. What setting for hearing is premature.

1. In a suit in chancery, when an answer is filed at rules in due time, four months from the time of the replication to the answer are allowed the parties for taking their depositions, by the act of February 17, 1823, in Sess. Acts of 1822-3, p. 39, ch. 37, § 1, Suppl. to Rev. Code, p. 129. And until the expiration of the said four months, neither party has the right (without the consent of the other) to set the cause for hearing.

Poling v. Johnson, 255

II. Consequence if cause be prematurely set and heard.

2. It appearing by the record of a suit in chancery, that the answer and replication were filed at August rules 1840; that at September rules 1840 the plaintiff set the cause for hearing; and that on the 5th of October 1840 the cause was heard upon the bill, answer, replication, depositions, exhibits, and arguments of counsel, and a decree made against the defendants, held, the cause was prematurely set for hearing, and prematurely heard. The decree was therefore reversed with costs, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to send the case to rules, there to remain for two months before it shall be set for hearing at the instance of either party, (unless it be set for hearing before the lapse of the two months by the consent of parties,) and for such decree in the case after it shall be set for hearing, as may be proper. HUSBAND AND WIFE.

I. When husband is a mere trustee for the wife.

1. By deed of marriage settlement, personal property of the wife is conveyed to the husband for the exclusive *benefit of the wife and her children during her life, and at her death for her issue, if any then living; and it is provided that in the event of the wife's dying without issue, the property shall be distributed in the same manner as if the deed had not been made. Upon the death of the husband without children (the wife still living), a creditor of the husband, at whose suit the latter took the oath of insolvency, claims that the husband has an interest in the property, which may be charged in the event of the wife's dying without issue: held, the conveyance to the husband was merely in the character of trustee, and its effect was to intercept the marital rights of the husband, and preclude him from all beneficial interest during the existence of the trust; that the provision for the event of the wife's dying without issue looked not to the state of things existing at the time of the marriage, but to such as should exist at the death of the wife; that the purpose was in such event to divest the legal title conveyed to the husband as trustee, and let the personal estate stand upon the same footing as any other personal chattels of a wife not reduced into possession by the husband during the coverture; that if the husband had survived the wife, he would have had a right to administer upon her personal estate, and hold the same free from distribution; but in the event that actually occurred, of the survivorship of the wife, the husband at no time acquired any individual ownership of the subject.

III. Validity, as against wife surviving, of husband's assignment of her personalty.

3. The rule laid down by sir Thomas Plumer in Hornsby v. Lee, 2 Madd. C. R. 16, american edi. 352, and Purdew v. Jackson, 1 Russ. 1, and afterwards confirmed by lord Lyndhurst in Honner v. Morton, 3 Russ. 65, 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 298, that where a husband assigns personal property in which his wife has a reversionary interest expectant on the death of tenant for life, and the wife and the tenant for life both outlive the husband, the wife is entitled by survivorship in preference to the assignee, recognized as correct by Allen, J. Contra, opinion of Gibson, C. J., in the case of Siter & another, 4 Rawle 471-483.

Browning v. Headley, 340

4. The rule laid down in Lord Carteret v. Paschal, 3 P. Wms. 197, 2 Brown's Par. Cas. 10 (Tomlin's edi.) and Bates v. Dandy, 2 Atk. 207, 1 Russ. 33, note, and 3 Russ. 70, 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. Rep. 301, note, that where the wife has a present interest in personal property, and the husband makes a particular assignment of that interest for valuable consideration, though the thing assigned be no farther reduced into possession during the coverture, the title of the particular assignee will be good against the wife surviving, recognized as correct by judges Allen and Stanard. S. C., 340, 41

5. A testator directed his personal estate to be divided into shares, of which he gave one share to his daughter. The daughter's husband, for valuable consideration, assigned all the interest to which he was entitled, in right of his wife, in her father's estate. After this assignment, an act of assembly was passed by the legislature of Kentucky, in which state the husband and wife had become domiciled, declaring the marriage contract between them forever dissolved so far as respects her, and restoring her to all the rights and privileges of an unmarried woman, and further declaring her entitled, out of the estate of the husband, to receive alimony agreeably to the laws of the commonwealth. On a bill by the assignee against the testator's executor, the husband, and the wife, to recover her share of her father's estate, held by two judges, 1. That by the act of divorce, the right of the wife to her choses in action not reduced into possession during the coverture, is placed on the same ground as if the husband had then died: but, 2. That the interest of the wife in the subject assigned being 872 a present, not a reversionary *interest, and there being a particular assignment of that interest for valuable consideration, the title of the assignee is good against the wife. S. C., 341

IV. Wife's right to provision against husband and his assignee.

6. The doctrine of the english chancery, that where an absolute equitable interest is given to the wife, the court will not permit the husband to recover it without making a provision for the wife, and that the husband's assignee, whether general or particular, takes his interest subject to the same equity, recognized as binding upon the courts of this state. And the doctrine carried farther than it was carried in Beresford &c. v. Hobson &c., 1 Madd. C. R. 361, american edi. 199, by sir Thomas Plumer, who considered that the court in no case had given the whole to the wife; not even "where the husband has left his wife and gone abroad."

Browning v. Headley, 341

7. A testator directs his estate other than slaves to be turned into money, and directs the slaves and money to be divided amongst ten legatees, any advances to whom are to be deducted from their respective shares. The husband of a daughter assigns her interest for valuable consideration. On a bill by the assignee against the executor, the husband, and the wife, it is insisted by the wife that a provision should be made for her. No evidence is taken by the assignee to shew that the whole interest would be more than an adequate provision. But it appears that the penalty of the executor's bond was only 30,000 dollars, and the consideration for the assignment only 1500 dollars; that the husband had received from the testator upwards of 2000 dollars in money and property, and that he had squandered the same, and then abandoned his wife, leaving her with 6 or 7 children in a destitute condition, in consequence of which she obtained a divorce: held, under the circumstances, no enquiry before a commissioner is necessary, to ascertain what would be a reasonable provision for the wife; that it is plain the whole residue coming from her father's estate will not be more than an adequate provision for her; and the bill should be dismissed. JOINT TENANTS.

Effect of deed by one, conveying part of the land by metes and bounds.

At the trial of the mise joined in a writ of right, after the demandants had introduced a grant to their ancestor, embracing the land demanded, the tenant introduced an earlier grant of the land to two grantees, and offered to give in evidence a deed from one of those grantees, conveying by metes and bounds a particular part of the land to a person under whom he (the tenant) claimed, and also offered other evidence tending to prove that partition had been in fact made, though without deed, between the two grantees. The circuit court, being of opinion that the conveyance by metes and bounds by one joint tenant, of a portion of the land held jointly, was void, refused to permit the same to go in evidence to the jury; and a verdict and judgment were rendered for the demandants: held, the circuit court erred; and its judgment therefore reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial, on which the conveyance, if offered, is not to be rejected on the ground that it is void.

JUDGMENT.

- I. What is the record of a judgment confessed, and how far evidence aliunde is admissible to shew the power and action of attorney confessing the same.

1. On a motion for award of execution against three obligors in a forthcoming bond, one of whom is principal and the other two are sureties, the entry upon the record states that as well the plaintiffs came by their attorney, "as the defendant M." (the principal) "in his proper person, and the other defendants by their attorney, and the said defendants acknowledge judgment." In the same entry (after the judgment) is the following: "And the plaintiffs by their attorney here in court release to the defendants 183 dollars 60 cents, and agree to stay execution of this judgment until the first day of the next term." On a bill in equity by the sureties, claiming a discharge on the ground that the agreement to stay was without their consent *or knowledge, it is alleged that the sureties did not appear by an attorney at law, but by an attorney in fact; that the power under which the attorney acted did not authorize him to confess judgment with stay of execution; and that in fact he never consented to such stay, but the agreement for the stay was with the principal alone. The power of attorney is in these words: "We authorize J. M. to confess judgment for us and in our name, on a delivery bond in favour of S. & S. executed by us on the 18th November 1840;" and is signed and sealed by the three obligors; held, 1. That the entry must be taken altogether, and regarded as the record of a judgment between the parties upon the confession of the defendants therein, with the condition of a stay of execution. 2. That it not appearing from that record whether the sureties appeared by an attorney at law or an attorney in fact, evidence aliunde is admissible for the purpose of proving that they appeared by an attorney in fact, and to shew the authority under which he acted. 3. That the power of attorney under which the attorney acted did authorize the confession of a judgment with stay of execution. 4. That parol testimony is not admissible to prove that so much of the entry as relates to the stay of execution was without the consent of the said attorney; dissentiente Standard, J.

III. Who shall be deemed impartial jurors for trial of felon.

3. On the separate trial of a prisoner jointly indicted with three others for murder, several persons called as jurors are examined on voir dire touching their indifference. 1. One of them states, that he has heard rumours and conversations in the country touching the case of the prisoner, and a representation of part of the evidence given on the trial of one of the parties indicted with him, and from these sources of information, if the same be true, he had made up an opinion of decided character, which he still entertains, and which will remain the same unless removed by evidence of a state of facts different from what he has heard; but he feels no prejudice or bias for or against the prisoner, and is satisfied that the opinion so formed and entertained would have no influence upon his mind in trying him, and that he could now give him as impartial a trial upon the evidence as if he had heard nothing of his case. 2. Another juror states, that he has heard no evidence in relation to the prisoner's case, nor formed any opinion on the question of his guilt or innocence; that he was present at the trial of another of the parties indicted, and heard a part of the evidence, from which he had formed a decided opinion as to that party, and if he were now called to try him, he should be influenced thereby; but that opinion would have no influence 875 *upon his mind in trying this prisoner, as to whom he feels no prejudice or prepossession, and he thinks he could try him as fairly and impartially as if he had heard nothing about the transaction. 3. A third juror states, that he heard the reports in the country concerning the death of the deceased, and the prisoners implicated therein, and had formed some opinion thereon, dependent upon the truth and fullness of those reports; he believed them to be true at the time he heard them, and the opinion formed on them was decided, and yet rests upon his mind; but he is satisfied the opinion so formed would have no influence upon him in trying the prisoner, and he could now try him according to the evidence, free from any leaning or bias for or against him, and decide the case as impartially as if he had previously heard nothing of it: held, all of these persons are good and impartial jurors.

3. An obligation given on the retainer of counsel to defend the obligor on a charge of forgery, is assigned by the counsel, and judgment is obtained thereupon by the assignees, on which judgment execution issues, under which a forthcoming bond is taken, and judgment is rendered thereupon. After these proceedings, without any defence having been made at law, and without any excuse for not making it, an injunction is obtained on the ground that the obligor was induced to employ the obligee, by the menace that if he did not, the obligee would act as counsel against him in aid of the prosecution: held, the injunction should be dissolved and the bill dismissed: for if in law such a contract was valid, a court of equity has no right to absolve the party from it; and if in law the contract was invalid, the defence should have been made in that forum.

VI. What grants of adm'n are valid: what payments by representative of deceased adm'r to succeeding adm'r are good against legatees: for what assets succeeding adm'r and his sureties are liable to legatees.

6. Pending a suit in chancery by legatees against an executor to recover their legacies, the executor died. Process was awarded to revive the suit against his administrator; and the administrator dying, process was issued and an order entered to revive the suit against his representative. But afterwards that process was quashed and that order set aside, as early as 1811; and then, by consent of parties, the suit was revived against the administrator de bonis non of the executor, and by like consent it was entered that the cause was not to abate by the death of any of the parties. A personal decree was obtained in 1818 by the legatees against the administrator de bonis non, from which he appealed. Pending the appeal, he died. Whereupon, though the two former grants of administration on the executor's estate had been by the court of Orange, the court of Hanover now granted administration on the same estate, not in the form of a grant de bonis non, but of an original grant. At the instance of the legatees, a scire facias issued to revive the appeal against this new administrator, (calling him administrator de bonis non) which was duly executed, and in 1822 the decree affirmed. In the caption to the decree of affirmance, the name of the administrator de bonis non against whom the decree of the court below was entered did not appear as a party, but the new administrator was mentioned therein as appellant. In 1823, a bill of revivor and supplement was filed in the court below, convening before the court, and seeking to charge, the representatives of the first administrator and of the first administrator de bonis non. It turned out, that after the scire facias to revive the appeal had been executed, and before the decree of affirmance, the new administrator had, in the character of administrator de bonis non, brought suits and obtained decrees for the assets of the executor's estate in the hands of the representatives of the first administrator and of the first administrator de bonis non, against those representatives respectively, without opposition on their part; and the decrees so obtained were soon after satisfied. Those decrees were in 1820 and 1821, about six years before the decision in Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo &c., 5 Rand. 51: held, 1 (in accordance with Fisher v. Bassett and others, 9 Leigh 119,) that the grants of administration by the court of Orange to the first administrator and the first administrator de bonis non, never having been reversed or 877 *revoked, must be considered valid grants, which conferred upon those administrators respectively all the powers of rightful administrators. 2. That when the grant to the first administrator de bonis non expired by his death, and there was no conflicting right in existence, it was competent for the court which might in the first instance have rightfully exercised jurisdiction, to act on the subject; and Hanover court having acted when there was no such conflicting right, and its grant not having been reversed or revoked, that grant is valid, and the sureties in the administration bond taken by Hanover court are liable thereupon. 3. That as the legatees, after the death of the first administrator, dismissed his representative from the suit, it was lawful for that representative to pay over to the administrator against whom the legatees were proceeding, the unapplied assets of the executor's estate; and such payment, made in good faith and under the sanction of a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, is a complete protection to such representative against the legatees, as to the money so paid. 4. That the decree in favour of the legatees against the administrator de bonis non was personal, only in respect to the assets in his hands, and (it being nowhere alleged that he had converted or wasted the same) such unapplied assets coming to the hands of his representative must in equity be regarded as unadministered assets of the executor's estate; and the representative of the administrator de bonis non having in good faith, and in pursuance of the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, paid over the said assets to the administrator against whom the legatees revived the appeal, such payment protects the estate of the administrator de bonis non from the claim of the legatees. 5. That for the assets so paid over by the representatives of the first administrator and of the administrator de bonis non, the administrator to whom such payment was made, and the sureties in his official bond, are liable. 6. That the dismissal of the bill as to the representatives of the first administrator and of the administrator de bonis non should be without costs.

VII. Setoff of distributee's share against his purchases.

7. The rule laid down in Pulliam v. Winston &c., 5 Leigh 324, that a distributee purchasing at an administrator's sale cannot injoin the collection of the bond for his purchases until his distributive share is ascertained and set off against the bond, approved as a general one; but an exception to it is recognized.

Hickerson's adm'r v. Helm, 628

VIII. Injunction by distributive's donee of a slave to sale under execution for distributee's debt to estate, and setoff of distributable share against the judgment.

8. In November 1815, at a sale by an executor on twelve months credit, a distributee was one of the purchasers. The person requested to be her surety manifesting some reluctance to become such, the executor assured him that there was no danger of his having any thing to pay, as the purchases by the distributee were not so much as her portion of the estate. Whereupon the bond was executed. The executor died in 1821, and there was immediate administration on his estate, and on that of the first testator; but no suit was brought on the bond till 1827. Judgment was then obtained on it: and in the same year some of the legatees brought a suit for a settlement of the executorship account. In 1832, the distributee acquired slaves by the death of her father, and made a voluntary conveyance of them. One of them was sold under execution upon the judgment, and purchased by the administrator de bonis non at the sheriff's sale. Two others being afterwards levied on, the donee filed a bill in 1833 against the judgment creditor, to restrain the sale. During all this time there was no settlement of the executorship account; and none took place until the administrator of the executor was coerced to settle, by attachments for his contempt in disobeying the orders of the court in the suit of the legatees: held, 1. On the donee's bill, an injunction may be awarded to restrain the sale of the two slaves levied on, until the amount of the distributee's claim is ascertained; and when ascertained, the same may be set off against the judgment. 2. The distributee is an indis-

878 pensable party to *the donee's suit.

3. As a suit is pending in which all the other distributees are parties, there is no necessity to make them parties in the donee's suit, but the proper course is to retain the injunction until, by the adjustment of the account in the other suit, the amount of the distributee's claim is finally liquidated, and then to apply that amount as a setoff against the judgment. It being ascertained that after allowing credit for the entire claim of the distributee, she was indebted, at the time of the sale of the slave first levied on, more than the amount for which he sold, the credit in respect to that slave cannot be enlarged to what is estimated as his value at the time of the sale, but must be limited to the amount made on the execution by the sale of him: dissentiente Baldwin, J., on the last point.

XI. When ex'or cannot compel legatee to refund.

11. The rule of the english courts, that where an executor voluntarily pays a legacy, he cannot afterwards maintain a bill to compel the legatee to refund, unless it becomes necessary for the discharge of debts, recognized and acted on.

Davis &c. v. Newman, 664

12. A testator owing no debts and having bequeathed legacies, his executor voluntarily made considerable payments to the legatees, under an impression that a bond for a large amount, executed by a debtor of the testator to the latter in his lifetime, was good and would be collected. The bond turned out to be unavailing, and the other assets were less than what was paid the legatees: held, though the executor may not have been culpably negligent in respect to the bond, and therefore not chargeable with its whole amount, yet he cannot recover back from the legatees any part of what he had paid them.

MILLS.

I. Ownership of applicant for leave to erect mill, and proprietorship of party receiving notice.

1. A person owning real estate died intestate, leaving a widow and children; and dower not being assigned to the widow, she continued in the mansion house and the plantation thereto belonging. Under the act in 2 R. C. of 1819, ch. 235, § 1, p. 225, notice was given to the widow as the proprietor of the land, by a person desiring to build a machine useful to the public, and to abut his dam against the said land, that application would be made for a writ of ad quod damnum: and the writ was accordingly awarded, and an inquisition returned. After which, one of the heirs, who resided on the plantation with his mother, being made a defendant on his motion, moved the court to dismiss the case, upon the ground that notice of the application ought to have been given to him as one of the proprietors; but his motion was overruled. He then offered to introduce evidence to prove that the applicant did not own the land on which he proposed to erect his machine: but it being proved that the applicant was in possession of the land, claiming title to it, and had built a house thereon, the court refused to permit the evidence so offered to be introduced: held, there is no error in these proceedings. For it was sufficient that the person making the application was in the actual possession and occupation of the land on which the machine was to be built; and that the person to whom the notice was given was the tenant in possession, and appeared as the visible owner.

Pitzer v. Williams, 241

II. When mill owner cannot be enjoined from rebuilding dam.

2. Two verdicts were rendered in favour of a party whose land was overflowed, against the owner of a mill, for keeping his dam too high. The dam was then swept away: and the plaintiff at law thereafter exhibited a bill of injunction against the mill owner, which alleged that he had not begun, within the time prescribed by law, to rebuild the dam, and also contained a suggestion in general terms, that irreparable mischief would result to the plaintiff from rebuilding the same. It did not appear that there was any order of court granting leave to build the mill and dam; it did appear, however, that the mill and dam had existed more than 50 years: held, that the verdicts for keeping the dam too high shew that the mill owner had at least a prescriptive right to keep the dam at some height; that these verdicts did not warrant an injunction to restrain him from rebuilding the dam, in the absence of any allegation in the bill that he was about to build it, or had threatened to build it, beyond the authorized height; and that if it was competent for a court of equity to interpose at all to enforce a forfeiture of the mill owner's right because of his failure to rebuild the dam within the time prescribed by law, it ought not to be done by way of injunction, without an allegation in the bill of some distinct and sufficient ground of irreparable mischief.

880 *II. What grantor has no right of redemption.

2. A deed in made, whereby, after reciting that F. the grantor hath sold to H. the grantee, for the sum of 200 dollars, certain real and personal estate, it is witnessed that the grantor, in consideration of that sum, conveys the same to the grantee; and then the deed concludes as follows: "It is agreed and fairly understood by and between the said F. and H. that in case the said H. or his heirs or assigns shall not be able to make the aforesaid 200 dollars out of the estate herein before conveyed, that then the said F. shall refund the same to the said H. or his heirs or assigns, with lawful interest thereon from this date till paid, or such part of the said 200 dollars as the said H. shall not be able to realize as aforesaid." Under the authority of this deed, the grantee sells and conveys the estate, and his grantee again sells and conveys the same. After which, to wit, about ten years after the date of the first mentioned deed, the grantor in that deed files a bill in equity to redeem the estate conveyed, on paying whatever may be due of the 200 dollars, with interest: held, the bill cannot be sustained. Allen, J., dissented, considering the case within the principle of Chowning v. Cox and others, 1 Rand. 306, recognized more recently in Breckenridge v. Auld and others, 1 Rob. 148. The two other judges who sat in the case (Stanard and Baldwin) considered it not within the principle of those cases.

III. Whether mortgagee may sell under power given by the mortgage.

3. The case of Chowning v. Cox and others, 1 Rand. 306, is a departure from the doctrine, now well settled in England and recognized in New York, that a mortgagee may sell the property after forfeiture, under a power given for that purpose in the mortgage deed: per Baldwin, J.—The doctrine so settled in England and recognized in New York seems to have been wholly overlooked by counsel and court in the argument and decision of Chowning v. Cox. Though this consideration may not warrant the reversal of that decision, it is most cogent to limit its authority to the particular case then in judgment. Per Stanard, J.

6. Slaves conveyed by deed of trust to secure what may be due from the grantor as guardian, are afterwards attached by a creditor of the grantor, and under the attachment are sold, subject to the prior lien of the deed of trust. In a suit by the ward, a decree is made for the sum due upon the guardianship account, and the decree directs the trustees to retain the slaves until the amount of the decree is satisfied, and then to surrender them to the purchaser at the sale under the attachment. On an appeal by the purchaser, the objection is taken that the decree ought to have provided for the sale of the slaves, so that out of the proceeds the amount of the decree might be paid, and the surplus paid to the appellant: held, the appellant has no right to have the decree reversed for this cause, but the same should be affirmed, with the addition thereto of a decree for the sale of the slaves; and the appellant should be decreed to pay the costs.

VII. Contribution, after death of grantor, between realty and personalty conveyed for payment of debts.

8. In 1810 a deed of trust was made, whereby it was witnessed, that for the purpose of securing to the grantor's creditors their debts, and to make provision for the support, education and future settlement of his children, he conveyed his whole estate in trust for the payment of 881 his *debts, and for that purpose the trustees were empowered to sell from time to time such parts of the premises as to them might seem fit, or authorized to dispose of the same, or any part thereof, in such manner as might by them be deemed most beneficial and advantageous to all the parties interested; and out of the rents and profits, they were to support the grantor and his wife, and their family, during the joint lives of the grantor and his wife, and the survivor of them during the life of the survivor; and then the estate was in trust for such children of the grantor as he might leave at his death. After making this deed, the grantor died the same year (1810), leaving a widow, and three children by her. In 1811, the acting trustee sold a portion of the real property, and the proceeds were applied towards the discharge of the debts. In 1814 one of the children died, whereby her interest in remainder in the whole estate passed to her mother and the two other children. In 1815 another child died, whereby his like interest (embracing that acquired through the child that had first died) passed to his mother and the surviving child. And in 1816 the widow died, whereby the interest in the remainder which she had so acquired, passed, as to the realty, to her surviving child, and as to the personalty, to her second husband, who survived her and became her administrator. At the period of the widow's death, part of the real and part of the personal estate conveyed was undisposed of by the trustee; and thereafter he disposed of part of each to satisfy debts: held, 1. the conversion in 1811, of part of the realty into personalty, being within the authority and discretion of the trustee, and made at a time when there was no conflict, but an identity of interest, amongst those entitled to the estate, cannot, by reason of circumstances thereafter arising, furnish any equity for a reimbursement of the realty out of the personalty, or for contribution in favour of the former against the latter. 2. That though, upon the widow's death, the succession to the real fell into a different channel from the personal property, yet as the authority and discretion of the trustee in regard to sales of the property, whether real or personal, continued as before, no equity could arise between the realty and personalty for reimbursement of one to the other, neither being primarily, but the whole estate indiscriminately, subjected to payment of the debts by the provisions of the trust deed; which, and not the principles governing the administration of decedents' estates, must give the rule upon the subject. But 3. that an equity of a different nature did, however, arise out of the provisions of the trust deed, so soon as the successions to the realty and the personalty so fell into different channels; and it was simply this, that the owners of the realty and personalty should contribute to the burthen of paying the debts remaining unsatisfied at the widow's death, in proportion to the value of their respective interests: and the exercise by the trustee of the authority and discretion vested in him, should not have the effect of disturbing the due apportionment of that burthen amongst those several interests.

MUTUAL ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

I. Who are members.

Shirley v. Mutal Assurance society, 705

II. Lien upon dower interest.

2. Where a husband insures property in the Mutual Assurance society and dies seized, his widow takes her dower interest subject to the lien of the society; but she incurs no personal *responsibility until dower is assigned her, whereby she becomes a member, and then only for such quotas and premium as accrue while she remains owner of the dower estate, with interest and damages thereon.

S. C., 705

III. Personal responsibility of successive tenants of premises insured.

3. Two tenements, which had been insured in the Mutual Assurance society, descend, upon the owner's death to his heirs, and are assigned to his widow for her dower.

The widow and her second husband sell and convey her life estate. And the society has a claim for quotas accrued after the death of the first husband; some before the assignment of dower; others afterwards and before the sale of the life estate; and the rest since that sale. It has also a claim for an additional premium accrued during the purchaser's ownership: held, 1. The heirs of the first husband are personally responsible for what accrued after his death and before the assignment of dower. 2. The widow and her second husband are personally liable for what accrued after the assignment of dower and before their sale. 3. The purchaser is personally responsible for what has accrued since, and for no more. 4. The party liable for any principal money is liable for interest and damages thereon.

IV. For what the lien exists, and how it will be enforced.

4. The Mutual Assurance society has a lien upon property insured therein for the principal and interest due the society, but not for damages. This lien is effectual not only against the original member, but against all persons deriving ownership from him, and the property may be sold to satisfy the same. Though one party has the estate for life and another the reversion, the lien will be enforced against the tenement insured by selling the whole fee simple title thereof, and the whole of the tenement, unless from the nature of the property it be practicable and expedient to lay off a portion thereof for sale. Before directing such sale, however, the respective personal liabilities of the several parties chargeable will be ascertained. And if the tenant for life advance the amount chargeable to the reversioner, as well as what is chargeable to himself, there will be no sale of the reversion, but a lien established thereon for reimbursement of the amount so advanced, with interest, to be enforced upon the falling in of the life estate.

1. Where a verdict of conviction in a criminal case is clearly against the evidence, or clearly without evidence to justify it, it is the duty of the court to set the verdict aside on the application of the prisoner, and to award him a new trial. But where, upon evidence merely circumstantial, the jury has found the prisoner guilty, and the court which tried the case has refused to grant a new trial, the verdict will not be disturbed by the general court, even though, in the opinion of that court, the evidence do not amount to very strong and clear proof.

II. How will may be impeached after probat.

2. The statute in 1 R. C. 1819, p. 378, § 13, which allows a person interested to appear within seven years after probat of a will, and by bill in chancery to contest the validity of the will, applies only to written and not to nuncupative wills.

S. C., 424

3. Where a nuncupative will has been proved before a court of competent jurisdiction, after fourteen days from the death of the testator, and after the widow has been summoned to contest the same, as directed by the act in 1 R. C. 1819, p. 379, § 18, the sentence of the court admitting the same to probat is binding upon her, and cannot be impeached except by appeal therefrom, or by a bill in equity founded upon her having been prevented by fraud or accident from making her defence in the court of probat.

III. Invalidity of will as to realty.

4. A nuncupative will is of no effect in law in relation to the testator's real estate, or the profits to accrue therefrom. But where, in the lifetime of the testator, a division was made between him and his two brothers of their father's real estate, which was acted upon by him in his lifetime by taking possession of the part allotted to him, and was also confirmed and ratified by him at the time of making his nuncupative will, the validity of such division was recognized in a court of equity. S. C., 425

IV. Construction and effect of will.

5. A testator, by a nuncupative will, gave to his wife certain slaves and articles of personalty, "exclusive of the portions of his estate she would be entitled to as his widow under the law." His wife being pregnant, he said he wished his estate to be kept together and managed by his brothers for the benefit of his wife and child during her widowhood, and in the event of her marriage he wished them to manage the child's part of the estate. If the child should live, and then die under age without lawful issue, he wished his brothers to have the whole of his estate in equal portions, except the slaves and articles specifically given to his wife. The child died in ten days after his birth, living the testator's brothers, who were the next of kin of the testator and of the child: held, that by the true construction of the will, the testator intended that his wife should have in absolute ownership the slaves and other personal property specifically bequeathed to her, together with her legal rights in his estate as his widow, and nothing more: that the child inherited the real estate, subject to the widow's right of dower therein, and was entitled under the will (after payment of debts) to the slaves not specifically bequeathed, subject to the widow's life estate in one-third thereof, and to distribution with the widow, in conformity to law, of the other personal estate not specifically bequeathed: and that, upon the death of the child, his interest 884 in the *real estate descended to his paternal uncles, and his interest in the slaves and other personal property passed to them under the executory bequest in their favour contained in the will. PATENT.

I. What patent for land settled is invalid.

1. Construction of the act in 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 86, § 40, p. 330, which declares that "no entry or location on any lands within this commonwealth, which have been settled thirty years prior to the date of such entry or location, and upon which quit-rents or taxes can be proved to have been paid at any time within the said thirty years, shall be deemed valid;" and relinquishes any title that the commonwealth may be supposed to have thereto.

Tichanal v. Roe, 288

2. In 1796, a person settled upon, cleared and improved a tract or land. In 1806, he conveyed a part of it by metes and bounds. And in 1834, the land embraced in this conveyance was granted by the commonwealth in conformity with a survey made in 1833. It appearing that the tenant claiming under the deed of 1806 had entered upon, settled and improved the land conveyed by this deed, and had, during the period he held it, paid the taxes thereon, and that a portion of this land was actually enclosed in 1796, when the tract of which it then formed a part was settled, held, it is competent for the tenant to connect his possession with the possession of those under whom he claims (the same never having been interrupted); and it thus appearing that the location on which the commonwealth's grant was founded was on lands which had been settled thirty years prior to the date of the location, and upon which taxes had been paid within that time, held, farther, that the location was invalid, and that no title passed by the commonwealth's grant. (falsifying the facts deposed to) "and so the defendant did, in manner and form aforesaid, commit wilful and corrupt perjury." On general demurrer to the indictment, held,

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

I. Power of attorney.

1. Construction of power of attorney to confess judgment. See Power of attorney, and

Calwell's v. Sheilds & Somerville, 305

II. What purchase by agent from principal will be set aside.

2. The doctrine of the english chancery, that a person standing in the confidential relation of agent cannot, while that relation continues and before that confidence is withdrawn, make a purchase from the principal (that will bind the latter) of a subject within the scope of the agency, recognized and acted upon.

Buckles v. Lafferty's legatees, 292

3. A testator (amongst other things) directed lands to be sold, and legacies to be paid out of the proceeds. The administratrix with the will annexed, on whom the power of making the sale was conferred, appointed an agent, who did the business of the administration, and received the commissions allowed the administratrix. She was old, and had great confidence in him, and he acted in a great degree without her supervision, and practically conducted the administration without control. After several previous attempts by the agent to sell one of the parcels of land, it was put up at auction (as the sale bill announced) for the last time, and knocked down to a person requested by the agent to bid (for the purpose of promoting the sale) at 21 dollars 52 cents per acre, a higher bid than had been made on any previous occasion. Some persons present were willing to have given as much as 25 dollars per acre; and one of them, who was surprised when the land was knocked off and not to his bid, on the same day (immediately after the sale) stated to the agent his willingness to have gone higher if necessary. A few weeks afterwards, the agent purchased the land from the administratrix by private contract at 22 dollars per acre, and took a conveyance of it from her. This was in 1829. In 1835, a bill was filed by the legatees to rescind the sale and conveyance. The bill alleged that the proceeds of the sale were insufficient to pay the legacies, and it further alleged that most of the plaintiffs were non-residents who had not been in Virginia since the sale, and that some were infants and femes covert: held, 1. A purchase by such an agent is in substance no better than a purchase from himself, and though it might bind him, is not binding on the legatees, unless ratified by them deliberately and on full information. 2. No such ratification appearing, the delay in this case to impeach the purchase (due allowance being made for the infancy of some and the nonresidence of others) does not deprive the plaintiffs of their right to the aid of equity. 3. The extent of the interest of the plaintiffs ought by a proper account to be ascertained, to the end that the purchaser may, if he thinks proper so to do, remove that interest by paying to the plaintiffs the parts unsatisfied of their legacies. 4. If the purchaser should not do this, the plaintiffs will be entitled to have the land reexposed to sale at a proper upset price, to be ascertained by debiting the purchaser with the profits of the land or with a fair annual rent therefor since his purchase, and crediting him first with his payments and interest on the same, and secondly with all his substantial and permanent improvements. The balance, with the addition thereto of a reasonable amount for the commission and charges of resale, is the sum at which the land should be set up, on a credit of 6, 12 and 18 months, bearing interest. 5. If the land and improvements should not sell for more than the upset price, the purchase should stand confirmed: if it should sell for more, then the former sale should be vacated, the purchase money on the resale duty collected from the purchaser at the same, and a conveyance made to him, and the proceeds of the resale applied, 1st. to pay the charges of sale; 2dly, to pay the first purchaser the balance due him upon an account stated as before mentioned; and the surplus to the legatees, according to their respective rights.

REGISTRY.

What registry of trust deed of personalty is invalid.

It was the intention of the legisla-

889 ture in the act of 1792 regulating *conveyances, (1 vol. of Old Revised Code, p. 157, § 2, 4,) to require a deed of trust or mortgage of personal estate to be recorded in the general court, or in the court of the district, county or corporation in which the grantor resided. Therefore where a deed of trust of personalty, dated the 15th of July 1812, stated the grantor to be of Henrico county, and the trustee and cestui que trust to be of the town of Petersburg, and the deed was never recorded in Henrico but only in Petersburg, and there was no evidence to shew that either at the date of the deed, or of its recordation in Petersburg, the grantor resided in that town, held, the deed so recorded is void as to the grantor's creditors.

Pending a suit in chancery by creditors for the sale of their debtor's land, the heirs of the debtor lease the land to a tenant for 3 years from the first of April, unless there shall in the mean time be a decree of sale, in which case the tenant is to give possession on the first of April after the decree. A rent is reserved of $300, to be paid at the end of each year of the tenancy. And according to the true construction of the lease, the tenant has a right to the crops growing on the land at the end of every year for which rent is reserved. In June of the third year, the land is sold under a decree in the creditors' suit, and the tenant applies to the purchasers for permission to proceed with the cultivation of the land; but one of the purchasers, in presence of the other (who had been one of the lessors), refuses, declaring that if the tenant sows the land, he the purchaser will reap the crop; and in consequence of this refusal the tenant proceeds no farther with his preparations for a fall crop, though he remains in possession of the land the third year. A few days before the expiration of that year, the purchasers sue out an attachment against the tenant for $300 rent to become due the first of April, upon the levy whereof the tenant gives to the sheriff bond and security for the rent. Judgment being obtained on this bond, the same is enjoined as to $200, upon the bill of the tenant praying an abatement of the rent according to equity: held by two judges, 1. that under the circumstances, the purchasers were not warranted in assuming the relation of landlord for the purpose of coercing the payment of the $300; 2. that there not having been an actual eviction, there was no remedy at law, and it was competent for the tenant to come into equity upon the ground that he was entitled to an abatement; and 3. the evidence justifying the allowance of $200 as a fair abatement, the injunction should be perpetuated.

Upon an amended bill against the surety as well as the husband, it appears that the surety, while bound as such, and of course with full knowledge of the plaintiff's claim, caused the slave to be removed and sold out of the commonwealth, through the instrumentality of an agent: held, 1. That for such removal and sale in contempt and subversion of the court's authority, it is competent for the court to give redress and vindicate its jurisdiction by decreeing in favour of the plaintiff against both the obligors in the bond. 2. That the measure of relief is not for the value of the slave, but for the value of the plaintiff's reversionary estate in her, which should be ascertained by reference to a commissioner. 3. That the agent of the surety, by his agency in the removal and sale of the slave, would have subjected himself to the like decree, if he had known at the time of the claim of the plaintiff, and had confederated with the surety to defeat the same.

SPECIFIC EXECUTION.

I. What contract will be enforced against vendee.

1. In 1814 land was sold, possession thereof delivered, part of the purchase money paid, and a contract, made to pay a further part when a lawful right should be conveyed. In 1820 a bill was filed by the vendor and his wife (who claimed to have inherited the land from her father) against the vendees and their assignee, asking specific execution of the contract. The bill also made defendant a nonresident, who, it was alleged, had formerly owned the land, and conveyed it to the father by a deed which was accidentally destroyed before it was placed on record. The assignee in his answer said, he had heard a report that the father mortgaged the land to secure 892 *a debt which was yet unpaid. He professed his readiness to pay the balance due from him to the vendees, upon receiving a title to the land, and a release of the mortgage if there was one. The non-resident defendant, though proceeded against by publication, put in no answer. It was proved by a witness, that in 1794 the non-resident defendant conveyed the land to the father of the female complainant; that the deed was acknowledged before three witnesses, and delivered to one of them to have it recorded; and that it was accidentally burnt while in his possession. In 1830 a decree was made for specific execution. During all this time the vendees and their assignee, and the heirs of the latter, continued to hold possession of the land; none of them asked a rescission of the contract; and it did not appear that there was any such mortgage as was mentioned in the answer. Upon an appeal by the heirs of the assignee: held, 1. That as the conveyance to the father, though never recorded, and afterwards destroyed, was effectual against the grantor to vest the legal title in the father, and the great lapse of time since that conveyance, in connexion with the uninterrupted possession of the father and those claiming under him, furnished a sufficient presumption against any claim on the part of the grantor's creditors, the decree for specific execution was, under the circumstances, proper. 2. That as there was no record of the said conveyance, a commissioner should be directed to execute another deed from the grantor to the appellants. 3. That as the ancestor of the appellants was not bound to take the title until the existence and validity of the said conveyance had been judicially ascertained, and as the burthen of establishing these facts devolved on the vendors, they should be decreed to pay the costs.

Wade's heirs v. Greenwood & wife, 474

II. What decree will be made against heirs of vendee.

2. Where a suit is brought against a vendee for specific execution, and pending the suit he dies, and the same is revived against his heirs, they are not liable to a personal decree: the decree should merely be, that unless they pay the purchase money and interest within a period to be prescribed, the land shall be sold.

Wade's heirs v. Greenwood & wife, 475

3. In a suit by a vendor against the vendee's heirs, to subject lands to sale by virtue of the vendor's lien for his purchase money, it is, in general, an improper exercise of discretion to decree an immediate sale without allowing any time for redemption, or to decree the sale to be made for cash. If circumstances exist which render it expedient to sell forthwith and for cash, such circumstances should be disclosed by the record. If there be a decree to sell forthwith and for ready money, in a case in which nothing appears to call for or justify a departure from the general rule, the decree will for this cause be reversed. S. IV. Equitable relief to cestui que trust of bond secured by trust deed.

4. A testator having authorized a tract of land to be sold and the money put at interest for the benefit of his children, his executor sold the land and took a bond (secured by a deed of trust) to be paid the 21st of August 1820, with interest from the 25th of December 1817. On the 30th of October 1820, the executor received of the purchaser a sum of money, to be applied to the credit of the principal. The purchaser having sold part of the land and taken from his vendee four bonds, one payable the 16th of April 1821, and the others on the 25th of December in the years 1821, 1822 and 1823, the executor, on the 21st of January 1822, took an assignment of those bonds and of a deed of trust securing the same, and gave a receipt stating that they were to be credited in part of the principal at the dates at which those bonds were due. In June 1823, the purchaser joined the executor from selling under his deed of trust, upon the ground of a defect of title to two parcels of the land, one of 16½. the other of 100 acres, part of which last parcel being included in the sale to the subvendee, the alleged defect of title was made the ground also of injunction by him. In 1835, the injunction of the first purchaser was perpetuated as to the price of the 16½ acres, and dissolved as to the residuc, so far as it remained unpaid. The executor having in the mean time removed from the commonwealth, a bill was thereupon filed by some of the legatees, against the purchaser, the trustee in his deed of trust, the executor, and another legatee, to ascertain the balance due. The bill averred, that many years since, the bond payable to the executor was transferred to the legatee defendant, to collect for himself and the others interested. and he had removed from the state; that the complainants do not know where the bond is, or whether it is lost or destroyed; and that the trustee declines to advertise or sell, for want of the bond. As to all the defendants except the purchaser, the bill was taken for confessed: held, 1. Equity has jurisdiction; on the ground that the legatees, though entitled to the balance due from the *purchaser, are mere beneficiaries, having no legal right which they could assert at law; and also on the ground that, the case being one in which it would have been improper for the trustee to sell until some proceeding was had to ascertain the amount due, the creditors had a right to come into equity to have the amount ascertained. 2. The purchaser, having in his hands evidence of all the payments alleged by him, has no right to require that the bond shall be produced before an account is stated. 3. The payments which the executor agreed should be credited against the principal must be so applied; the case not being taken out of the influence of the principle laid down in Pindall's ex'x &c. v. The Bank of Marietta, 10 Leigh 484, by the circumstance that the party who so agreed was a fiduciary, nor by any of the other circumstances before mentioned.

III. Rights as distributee.

3. A testator dies possessed of slaves, to a third of which his widow, who renounces his will, is entitled during her life. In a settlement of the executorship account after the death of the executor, and after the widow's death, it appears by the appraisal that the slaves were seven in number. Two were specifically bequeathed by the testator, and the presumption is that they were delivered over to the legatees. Two were sold under execution of a creditor of the testator, before the executor had other assets in hand to pay the execution, and were purchased by the executor at the sheriff's sale. And two others were sold by the executor, though the payment of debts did not require the sale of them if the widow had paid up a sum of 792 dollars 48 cents, due from her for purchases of the testator's goods. When or for what prices these two were sold, did not appear. The record furnished no information of the disposition of the seventh slave; but the probability is that he was old and of little or no value: held, the charge for the widow's interest in the slaves, instead of being measured by their estimated hires, should be an annual sum from the death of her husband until her death, equal to the annual interest of one third of the gross amount of the sales or the value of the slaves: dissentiente Baldwin, J., who was of opinion that the widow was entitled to credit for one third annually of the estimated hires.

4. A testator, by his will, after directing that in the first place all his just debts shall be paid, devises and bequeaths to his wife, during her life, his plantation, all his stock and furniture, and six slaves by name; and then, after various specific devises and legacies to his children, directs as follows: "I desire that my wife will, as soon as convenient after my decease, purchase and deliver to my granddaughter C. C. a negro girl of about £50. price, which I give to my said granddaughter and her heirs." The wife is also named executrix. She qualifies as such, giving a bond with sureties; and the whole personal estate, other than specific legacies, is exhausted in payment of the debts. The widow having accepted the property given her by the will, and taken possession of the whole of it, held, she is liable personally as legatee, not as executrix, for the payment of the legacy to the granddaughter, and the sureties in her executorial bond are nowise responsible for the same.

5. A testator having six children, four the issue of a deceased wife, and two the issue of his present wife, devises to his two sons each a tract of land described by metes and bounds, directs that all his other lands shall be equally divided among his four daughters and their heirs, and then devises and bequeaths as follows: "My will is that my negroes be apportioned equally amongst my six children, under the following regulation, to say, that the one third thereof which shall be allotted to my wife as her dower shall be the full part of the two children I had by her, and also that the several negroes I have from time to time furnished any of my children be their right, but that they shall be each appraised and accounted for in their part of the division of my slaves. Lastly, I desire that all the residue of my estate not before specifically given be equally divided amongst my aforesaid six children." The will is made the 31st of December 1792, and the testator dies in 1794, prior to the 28th of October; between which periods, to wit, in November 1793, a third child of the testator by his second wife is born: held, 1. According to the authority of Yerby v. Yerby, 3 Call 334, the birth of such third child was not a revocation of the will. 2. As the will was published, and the testator died, before the passage of the act of 1794 providing for pretermitted children, the case does not fall within the operation of that statute. 3. Upon the true construction of the will, the afterborn child has no claim to share in the division of the dower slaves after the death of the widow.

WRIT OF RIGHT.

I. Matter of abatement.

1. Within what time the plea of several tenancy should be pleaded in a writ of right.

Walkers v. Boaz &c., 485

2. Upon a writ of right by three demandants, it appears at the trial of the mise, that the tenement demanded descended to the demandants and their two infant brothers from their mother, and that those two infants successively died without issue, and were survived by their father as well as by the demandants: held, 1. That upon the death of the infant who first died, his share of the tenement descended to his four brothers, without regards to the father; and upon the death of the other infant, the share which he derived by descent from the mother passed in like manner to the three brothers, but the share which he derived by descent from his brother (1-4th of 1-5th) descended to his father. 2. That according to the principles established in Garrard &c. v. Henry &c., 6 Rand. 110, and Linton and others v. Bartly and others, 9 Leigh 444, the fact of the father's having so become interested as tenant in common with the demandants (not having been pleaded in abatement) cannot prevent the demandants from recovering so much of the tenement as they shew title to, namely, all except that fourth of a fifth. S. C., 485

II. Seisin of demandant.

3. The decision in Green v. Watkins, 7 Wheat. 27, that in a writ of right, where the demandant shews no seisin by a pedis positio, but relies wholly on a constructive seisin by virtue of a patent of the land as vacant land, it is competent for the tenants to disprove that constructive seisin by shewing that the state had previously granted the same land to other persons, with whom the tenants claim no privity, approved and acted on.

Dawson v. Watkins, 259

4. The demandant in a writ of right claims the land (of which the tenant is in possession) under a patent bearing date the 17th of June 1786, and the tenant disproves the constructive seisin of the demandant, by shewing a patent for a large tract embracing the same land, which issued as early as the first of December 1773. Whereupon the demandant, to establish a seisin in deed by a pedis positio, proves that the patentee under whom he claims came, in 1824 or 1825, to the county in which the land lies, and employed an agent to enter upon and survey the said land and various others tracts in the same county; that the said agent procured a surveyor and chain carriers immediately thereafter, who went upon the land in questions, and surveyed and re-marked the same for the patentee: held, these facts are not sufficient to authorize a jury to find a seisin in the demandant.
